VOLUME SEVENTY-FOUR

QUART. As a measure of capacity both in dry and liquid measure, see the C.J.S. title Weights and Measures § 1, also 51 C.J. p 118 notes 45–49.

QUARTA FALCIDIA. A term of the Roman law having the same meaning as Falcidian Portion, see 35 C.J.S. p 492 note 28.

QUARTER. The fourth part of a thing;[34] as applied to money, twenty-five cents.[35] The term has been held synonymous with "fourth" see 37 C.J.S. p 137 note 64.1.

In English criminal law, to divide a criminal's body into quarters, after execution, as part of the punishment of high treason.[36]

Quartering soldiers is the act of a government in billeting or assigning soldiers to private houses, without the consent of the owners of such houses, and requiring such owners to supply them with board or lodging or both.[37]

QUARTERLY. Quarter-yearly;[38] every three months;[39] once in a quarter of a year.[40]

QUARTO DIE POST. On the fourth day after.[41]

QUARTZ. See Mines and Minerals § 2 b (8).

QUARTZ LODE. See Mines and Minerals § 3 b (4).

QUASH. A term derived from the French "quasser,"[42] and defined as meaning to annul;[43] to overthrow;[44] to abate, annul, overthrow, or make void;[45] to annul, overthrow, or vacate by judicial decision.[46] It has been distinguished from "discharge" see 26 C.J.S. p 1330 note 56, and "dismiss" see Dismissal and Nonsuit § 1.

34. Black L.D.

Phrases

(1) "Quarter day" defined see 25 C.J.S. p 1007 note 79.

"Quashed" has been held synonymous with "set aside" see 6 C.J.S. p 789 note 63.

Motion to quash, dismiss, or set aside indictments generally see Indictments and Informations §§ 195–218 For other particular applications and specific uses of the term consult the Descriptive-Word Index, sub verbo "Quashing."

QUASI. A Latin word[47] frequently used in the civil law,[48] and often prefixed to English words.[49] It is not a very definite word.[50] It marks the resemblance, and supposes a little difference, between two objects,[51] and in legal phraseology the term is used to indicate that one subject resembles another, with which it is compared, in certain characteristics, but that there are also intrinsic and material differences between them.[52] It negatives the idea of identity,[53] but implies a strong superficial analogy,[54] and points out that the conceptions are sufficiently similar for one to be classed as the equal of the other.[55]

"Quasi" is defined as meaning as if;[56] almost;[57] as though; as it were; in a manner; in a certain sense or degree; seeming; seemingly;[58] analogous to;[59] and it may mean resemblance.[60]

The word "quasi" is employed in various places throughout this work, and for particular applications and specific uses of the term see the phrases set out in the following paragraph and consult the indexes to the various titles and the Descriptive Word Index.

Phrases employing the word are set out in the note,[61] and for other phrases as to which more re-

I. RIGHT OF ACTION AND DEFENSES

A. NATURE, SCOPE, GROUNDS, AND SUBJECT MATTER OF ACTION

§ 1. Nature and Scope of Remedy in General

Equity has jurisdiction of a bill to quiet title, to remove an existing cloud thereon, or to prevent a threatened cloud. The purpose of such suits is to clear the title and determine the validity of adverse claims thereto.

Equity has inherent original jurisdiction of bills to quiet title to property,[1] and, on the principal of quia timet, recognized by courts of chancery from the earliest times, has jurisdiction to remove an ex-

Independent jurisdiction

(1) Bills to quiet title constitute an independent branch of equity jurisdiction.—Michalski v. Kruszewski, 198 A. 872, 330 Pa. 62—Parantino v. Meckley, Pa.Com.Pl., 28 North.Co. 370.

(2) If plaintiff has a clear legal title and possession, equity court has jurisdiction, independent of statute, to remove a cloud from title.—Hennett v. Neff, 42 S.E.2d 793, 130 W.Va. 121—Putnam Co. v. Fisher, 26 S.E. 2d 681, 128 W.Va. 383—Dolan v.

isting cloud from title[2] or to prevent a threatened cloud.[3] Actions to quiet title or to remove a cloud thereon are equitable in nature,[4] or, as sometimes said, of equitable cognizance,[5] and are governed by equitable principles and the rules pertaining to suits in equity.[6] A suit to quiet title must be legally predicated and may not arise from caprice or desire only.[7] Independently of statute, equity has no jurisdiction to render a decree merely establishing and confirming an existing title, without reference to any need to quiet it or remove a cloud therefrom.[8]

The purpose of a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud is to determine the existing title to property and the validity of adverse claims thereto.[9] The suit is designed to enable an owner of property whose title is beclouded by instruments or records constituting a semblance of title or a claim of right in another, which are in fact invalid or the enforcement of which would be inequitable, to have his title cleared and quieted by a decree canceling and avoiding the offending instruments or prohibiting the claim of any right under them.[10] Where the

(3) Suit to remove cloud from title, which deraigns title and specifically pleads such cloud, may be maintained in equity independently of statute.—Ashur v. McCreery, 300 P. 767, 150 Okl. 111.

Equitable origin

Suits to quiet title have their origin in equity jurisprudence.—Erskine v. Dykes, 150 P.2d 322, 158 Kan. 788.

Louisiana jurisprudence

Suit to remove cloud from title or to quiet title is recognized in jurisprudence of Louisiana.—Parish of Jefferson v. Texas Co., 189 So. 580, 192 La. 934, certiorari denied Texas Co. v. Parish of Jefferson, 60 S.Ct. 138, 308 U.S. 601, 84 L.Ed. 503.

"Removal" and "prevention" of cloud compared

The use of the terms "removing cloud" and "preventing a cloud" does not represent a real difference, and those cases in which a cloud is "removed" and those in which it is "prevented" are not merely governed by the same principles, but are indistinguishable as to the form of relief, and also as to the circumstances on which relief is granted.—Bank of America Nat. Quieting title or removal of cloud held proper remedy

(1) Landowner may test enforceability of covenants or servitudes asserted against his property in suit to quiet title.—Marra v. Ætna Const. Co., 101 P.2d 490, 15 Cal.2d 375.

(2) Action to quiet title was held proper remedy, where plaintiff claimed under parol gift from deceased mother, and defendants claimed as executrixes of grantee of plaintiff's mother.—Williams v. Stillwell, 19 P.2d 773, 217 Cal. 487.

(3) Where title of purchaser at mortgage foreclosure sale was challenged by mortgagor's grantee on whom no notice of foreclosure suit was served, action by purchaser to quiet title wherein grantee asserted ownership of part of realty was proper form of action in which to determine rights of parties.—Equitable Life Ins. Co. of Iowa v. Condon, 10 N.W.2d 78, 233 Iowa 567.

(4) Question whether recorded certified transcript of foreign judgment constitutes lien because of status of defendant as married woman at time of judgment and nature of cause of action as being one ex contractu is one for judicial inquiry in appropriate proceeding to cancel record as cloud on married woman's title.—Protective Holding Corporation v. Cornwall Co., 173 So. 804, 127 Fla. 252.

"Clear the title," "cure the title," "straighten out the title," and "remove cloud from title" have well understood meanings as applied to the law of real estate; they have reference to all such acts, steps, or proceedings as are necessary in order to render the title good and marketable, including the opinion of counsel that this has been done.—Johnston v. Cox, 154 So. 206, 114 Fla. 243.

purpose of a suit is to remove an apparent cloud, equity has jurisdiction to entertain the cause, and rule on the sufficiency of the bill, although it does not state facts sufficient to warrant the equitable relief prayed for.[11] An action to quiet title may be a proper method by which to settle the question whether a testator owned property which the decree of distribution of his estate purports to distribute;[12] and title to property can be settled in an action to quiet title independently of a determination of a probate court to determine who are the heirs entitled to succeed to an estate.[13] In a suit to remove a cloud on title, where it is shown that plaintiff has a clear legal title to the land in dispute and that defendant has none, a court of equity is not deprived of its jurisdiction because the determination of a question ordinarily cognizable at law is involved;[14] nor is equity deprived of jurisdiction by the fact that the determination of an action to quiet title requires the construction of a will under which all the parties claim as a common source of title.[15]

Whether a particular action is one to quiet title,[16] or to remove a cloud,[17] or to prevent a threatened cloud[18] depends on the nature of the relief sought, as determined by the pleadings. While an action by a plaintiff out of possession against a defendant in possession of real property, in the form of a suit to quiet title, possesses the essential characteristics of the old legal action of ejectment,[19] nevertheless a suit in chancery to remove a cloud on title is not tantamount to an action in ejectment to try title,[20] and an action in ejectment cannot be maintained under the guise of a suit to quiet title.[21]

§ 2. —— Bills to Quiet Title and to Remove Cloud Distinguished

A bill to quiet title, strictly considered, is a bill of peace to put an end to vexatious litigation, whereas a bill to remove a cloud is designed to procure the cancellation of an instrument or claim which may be used to injure a person in the enjoyment of his title; but this distinction is not always observed.

A suit to quiet title has been distinguished from a suit to remove a cloud.[22] A bill to quiet title, strictly considered, is substantially a bill of peace,[23] the purpose of which is to put an end to vexatious litigation in respect of the property involved.[24] A bill quia timet or to remove a cloud is a bill to procure the cancellation, delivery up, or release of an instrument, encumbrance, or claim constituting a claim on plaintiff's title, and which may be used to injure or vex him in the enjoyment of his title.[25] However, the distinction between bills to quiet title and to remove clouds thereon is not always observed,[26] and bills to remove a cloud are sometimes spoken of as bills to quiet title, and vice versa.[27]

§ 3. Grounds of Jurisdiction in General

The broad grounds on which equity removes a cloud on title are the prevention of litigation and the protection and determination of the true title, and, in cases requiring extrinsic evidence to invalidate an instrument affecting title, the possible future unavailability of the necessary evidence.

Bill regarded as one quia timet

Where it was determined that church became owner of property in fee simple under provision in will, there was no need for a decree for sale under statute, but, in view of fact that church could not sell property without a judicial decree establishing title and removing cloud cast on it by adverse claims, an amended bill was regarded as a bill quia timet.—McMahon v. Consistory of St. Paul's Reformed Church at Westminster, Md., 75 A.2d 122.

The broad grounds on which equity interferes to remove a cloud on title are the prevention of litigation and the protection of the true title and possession, and because it is to the real interest of both parties, and promotive of right and justice, that the precise state of the title be known, if all are acting bona fide.[28] The jurisdiction to grant equitable relief against a cloud on title is grounded in the need for the protection of complainant's title against the injury or vexatious embarrassment which may flow from the deed or other instrument or proceeding constituting the cloud.[29] The ground of equitable jurisdiction, where extrinsic evidence is necessary to show the invalidity of the instrument affecting the title, is that such document may be asserted to the detriment, injury, or embarrassment of the holder of the legal title when, by reason of lapse of time or other circumstances, the evidence to demonstrate its invalidity may not be available, or its authority may be impaired.[30] As otherwise stated, equity interposes to remove clouds from title because they embarrass the owner of the property clouded and tend to impede his free sale and disposition of it, and because the evidence of the party on which he relies to show the invalidity of the adverse claim may be lost by lapse of time.[31] Equity has been held to have jurisdiction to quiet title where the case involves fraud,[32] or the setting aside of a mortgage,[33] or the reformation of an instrument.[34]

Prevention of harassment by repeated assertion of defeated title. Equity will entertain a bill to quiet title by one who has successfully vindicated his title at law against another, where the latter continues to harass the former by continued assertion of his defeated title.[35] As a general rule, equity will not interfere to prevent harassment by continued assertion of defeated title unless plaintiff has vindicated his title by repeated judgments in his favor in actions at law,[36] but if the title is satisfactorily established it is not material what number of trials have taken place, whether two or more.[37] In jurisdictions where ejectment is regarded as a real action, one trial and judgment in ejectment is conclusive, and, when a party defeated in ejectment keeps on denying its effect and disquieting his adversary in possession, equity has jurisdiction to quiet the latter's title.[38]

§ 4. —— Lack of Remedy at Law

In general, equity takes jurisdiction to quiet title or remove a cloud where there is no remedy at law.

In general, a court of equity has jurisdiction to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon where no remedy at law exists.[39]

§ 5. —— Prevention of Multiplicity of Suits

As a rule, subject to some exceptions and qualifications, equity will entertain an action to quiet title in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

As a general rule, a court of equity, on the sole ground of preventing multiplicity of suits, will entertain an action to quiet title where there are a number of persons interested in it, and a great many actions at law would be necessary to conclude the title.[40] However, this rule is subject to some exceptions and qualifications,[41] and it will not apply where the exercise of jurisdiction would not in fact avoid a multiplicity of suits.[42] Furthermore there must be a community of interest in the subject matter, or a common title from which all the separate claims and all questions at issue arise.[43] In other words, in order to originate the jurisdiction on this ground, it is essential that there be a single claim of right in all the defendants, arising out of some privity or relationship with plaintiff.[44] Moreover, it has been held that the doctrine does not apply where defendants have nothing in common except their source of color of title, and each defendant has a distinct, different, and separate defense.[45]

§ 6. Statutory Remedies for Determination of Adverse Claims

a. In general
b. Construction, scope, and effect

a. In General

Under the statutes in many jurisdictions, an action may be maintained to determine adverse claims and quiet title independently of the common-law right to remove a cloud on title by a bill in equity. Such statutes ordinarily are constitutional and, depending on the particular provisions, may permit the maintenance of the action either at law or in equity.

In many jurisdictions statutes have been enacted authorizing actions to be maintained for the determination of adverse claims and to quiet title.[46] An action under statute to compel the determination of an adverse claim to realty is in its nature one to quiet plaintiff's title to the property and to remove any cloud thereon.[47] The action may be maintained independently of the common law right to remove a cloud on the title by a bill in equity,[48] and hence the existence of an equitable remedy to quiet title will not preclude an action under a statute conferring jurisdiction of such actions on certain courts of law.[49] The statutory action affords a means by which one in possession under claim of title may force a threatening but otherwise inactive adverse claimant to his proof, to the end that if such adverse claimant fails to show good title in himself he is forever silenced.[50] Specific matters affecting the right of action and defenses, as well as the procedure, under these statutes, are very generally regulated by the provisions thereof, and when the procedure is prescribed by the statute its provisions must be substantially followed.[51]

Such statutes are enabling acts,[52] and the proceeding thereunder is not usually regarded as a special proceeding, but as an action,[53] equitable in its nature[54] and governed by the rules pertaining to suits in equity,[55] or by equitable principles,[56] except where the statute directs otherwise.[57] Under some statutes the action is an action at law,[58] while under others it may be either an equitable action or an action at law, depending on the pleadings, issues, and relief sought;[59] if the issues tendered are equitable the proceeding is one in equity,[60] but where no equitable rights are set up by either party,[61] or where the answer sets up an equitable defense but seeks no equitable relief,[62] the action is one at law governed by the ordinary rules applicable to actions at law.

Rules as to quieting tax titles Statute respecting quieting title does not abrogate, but is subject to

As possessory action. In some jurisdictions the statutory action is the ordinary method of trying disputed titles; it is a possessory action, even the action of ejectment being practically superseded,[63] but in others it is not a possessory action.[64]

Constitutionality. Statutes enlarging equity jurisdiction in respect of actions to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon are within the powers of the legislature, and are constitutional,[65] unless they violate some particular constitutional provision.[66] If the effect of such a statute is to deprive parties of the right to trial by jury, the statute will not be sustained.[67]

Amendment or repeal. An amendment of a statute of this nature cannot affect judgments recovered prior to such amendment.[68] Where a statute authorizing suits to quiet title is repealed by an act relating to the same matter, the court has no authority to grant relief under the repealed statute.[69]

b. Construction, Scope, and Effect

Statutes providing for actions to determine adverse claims are remedial and should be liberally construed. They are generally held not to oust the antecedent jurisdiction of equity but, rather, to extend the equitable equitable rules regarding quieting tax titles.—Cremin v. Quigley, 139 So. 383, 104 Fla. 133.

Substance, not form, of pleading

Whether statutory proceeding to quiet title is action at law or suit in equity is to be determined by issues raised by substance of pleading rather than by form of pleading.—Wolfersberger v. Hoppenjon, 68 S.W.2d 814, 334 Mo. 817.

Allegations and prayer regarding receivership

Character of cause of action to quiet title is not changed by allegations and prayer regarding receivership, which is purely ancillary.—Ebbs v. Neff, 30 S.W.2d 616, 325 Mo. 1182.

Both law and equity

(1) Under some statutes action to determine interest in realty and quiet title must be either at law or in equity and cannot have attributes of both.—Ebbs v. Neff, supra.

(2) Under other statutes action to determine adverse claims embraces both common-law action of ejectment and equitable action to quiet title.—Udgaard v. Schindler, 31 N.W.2d 776, 75 N.D. 625—Cooper v. Gordon, 164 N.W. 21, 37 N.D. 247, L.R.A. 1918A 52.

Actions held in equity

(1) Action to quiet title was in equity where defendants' answer sought determination of estates, rights, titles, and interests of plaintiff and defendants severally, and removal from defendant's title of cloud of allegedly void deed to plaintiff's predecessor.—Rains v. Moulder, 90 S.W.2d 81, 338 Mo. 275.

51 C.J. p 137 note 47.

Determination of legal rights only

Action to establish fact of forfeiture of defendant's title to surface rights in land by breach of condition in deed to defendant, reentry by defendant's grantor, subsequent conveyance to plaintiff of defendant's grantor's right, title, interest, and remedies and plaintiff's ownership and right to possession sought only the determination of legal rights.—St. Joseph Lead Co. v. Legislative power not limited by doctrine of adequate remedy

The doctrine that equity has no jurisdiction where there is a complete and adequate remedy at law in no manner limits the power of the legislature to enlarge equity's jurisdiction to authorize the maintenance of suits to quiet title whether or not there is an adequate remedy at law.—Quintana v. Vigil, 135 P.2d 711, 46 N.M. 200.

Statutes providing for actions to determine adverse claims are remedial[70] and beneficial,[71] not penal, restrictive, or destructive,[72] and, like other remedial statutes, should be liberally construed,[73] and be held to embrace all cases coming fairly within their scope.[74] However, they will not authorize proceedings to determine matters not within the purpose and intent of their provisions, when properly construed,[75] nor, as to the jurisdictional facts specifically stated, can such statutes be extended beyond their terms.[76]

Whether a particular action is a statutory proceeding for the determination of adverse claims is determined by the provisions of the statute and the nature of the relief sought.[77] A statutory proceeding for partition may be converted by the answer into one to quiet title.[78] Where the action, although brought in form under the statute as an equitable action to quiet title, is in reality for the recovery of specific real property, and the issues made are purely legal and such as are cognizable in a court of law, the substance will control the form.[79]

Purpose and effect. The purpose of a statutory action to quiet title has been variously stated to be to determine adverse claims to real property,[80] to secure repose and to settle in one comprehensive action all conflicting claims,[81] to fix the status of

Actions held within statute

(1) Where both parties assert mere equities in real property, an action may be maintained under the statute to ascertain which party has the superior equity.—Turner v. Deacon, 289 P. 179, 106 Cal.App. 329.

(2) Fact that plaintiff as judgment creditor could have brought supplementary proceedings to determine the existence and extent of debtor's lien upon property, did not preclude plaintiff from proceeding under statute to quiet title in his judgment debtor.—Christie v. Morris, 149 P.2d 250, 116 Mont. 210.

(3) Provisions of real property law for determination of claims to real property were held not affected or superseded by remedy provided by county administrative code and tax law.—Connolly v. Danton, 54 N. Y.S.2d 131, 184 Misc. 761.

(4) Where electric lines were constructed over street railroad right of way with oral permission of owner of right-of-way easement, decree protecting rights of a licensee against and as superior to rights of fee-simple owner of servient estate involved title, estate, or interest in real property within the quiet title statute.—Eureka Real Estate & Inv. Scope of action to quiet title is limited to determination of conflicting claims to property in controversy.—Turner v. Bank of America Nat. Trust & Savings Ass'n, 87 P.2d 382, 135 Cal.App. 314.

Statutory conditions

Statute authorizing cancellation distinguished

Proceedings under statute authorizing action to quiet title to realty are not aimed at particular instrument, but at pretensions of individuals claiming adversely, while action under statute authorizing cancellation of instrument is directed to particular instrument dangerous to plaintiff's rights and object of action is to have such instrument canceled and cloud cast thereby removed.—Sanborn v. Determination of all legal or equitable rights

Statute providing for suits to determine interest and quiet title was intended to permit determination in one action of any and all rights, whether legal or equitable, of any litigant affecting title to real property involved in suit.—Rains v. Moulder, 90 S.W.2d 81, 338 Mo. 275

the land with respect to ownership,[82] and to re-establish by decree muniments of title to it.[83] The general purpose and effect of statutes of this class are not to restrict the previous jurisdiction of equity,[84] but to enlarge and extend the equitable remedy to cases in which, by the settled rules of equity, no relief could be had.[85] The proceeding authorized by such a statute has been said to be a mere extension of the principle quia timet.[86]

A statute extending the jurisdiction in actions to quiet title or remove clouds where plaintiff is out of possession does not enlarge the jurisdiction where he is in possession.[87] It has been held that statutes assuming to confer on equity jurisdiction to remove clouds from title, which do not give a more extensive remedy than exists by virtue of the customary jurisdiction of the chancery courts, may regulate the mode of proceeding and form of decree, but they are not necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction.[88] It is not the object of the statute to afford to a defendant in an ejectment action the option to deprive plaintiff of his right to a trial by jury and to permit defendant to elect in which court he will try the question of title.[89]

Ousting jurisdiction of equity. Although there are some cases to the contrary,[90] the general rule, as to the effect of statutes providing a legal remedy, where formerly the remedy was in equity by bill to quiet title, or remove cloud thereon, is that the antecedent jurisdiction of equity is not ousted by such statutes,[91] at least where the language used therein does not limit the remedy to the one therein provided.[92]

Effect of state statutes in federal courts. The right of action given by the state statutes under consideration may be enforced by an appropriate form of action in the federal courts, if the provisions of the federal constitution as to trial by jury, and of the statute forbidding suits in equity in any court of the United States where an adequate remedy at law exists, are not infringed;[93] and in such case the appropriate form of action in the federal courts is a bill in equity.[94] However, a federal court has no equitable jurisdiction of an action under a state statute providing for the determination of adverse claims, where the effect would be to deprive a party of his right to trial by jury,[95] or to give a right to relief where an adequate remedy at law exists,[96] as is ordinarily the case where the statutes authorizes the action to be brought by a party out of possession.[97] A federal court has jurisdiction under such a statute, if the circumstances are such that no adequate remedy at law exists,[98] as where both parties are out of possession, or the land is vacant and unoccupied, and plaintiff holds the legal title.[99] The federal Constitution and statute are held to refer to the right to trial by jury as it existed at common law;[1] and, if a state statute enlarging equitable jurisdiction does not deprive a party of the right to trial by jury as it existed at common law, the statute may be followed by the federal courts;[2] otherwise not.[3]

§ 7. Action in Personam or in Rem

An action to remove a cloud is generally, although not invariably, considered to be an action in personam. Actions under statutes providing for the determination of adverse claims ordinarily are held to be in the nature of proceedings in rem or quasi in rem, or, where personal service can be made, in personam as well as in rem.

The fundamental doctrine of equity, as originally administered, that every action in equity is purely an action in personam ordinarily applies to actions to remove clouds from title unless abrogated by statute.[4] However, it has been said that any suit to quiet title to realty acts on the property,[5] and under some circumstances an action to quiet title may be treated as one in rem[6] such characteristic of the suit being neither nullified nor minimized by the circumstance that the affected res is not formally reduced to the custody or possession of the court.[7]

It is generally held that actions under statutes providing for the determination of adverse claims are in the nature of proceedings in rem[8] or quasi in rem.[9] Some authorities have held that the character of the statutory action is determined by the nature of the process; that is, where personal service can be made the action is in personam as well as in rem, but where service can be obtained only by publication the action is in rem.[10]

§ 8. Subject Matter

The subject matter of an action to quiet title or remove a cloud is generally confined to land; but under, or even apart from, statute an action of this nature is sometimes available with respect to personalty.

The subject matter of equitable jurisdiction to quiet title or remove a cloud is generally held to be confined to land,[11] including the surface of the ground and everything that is on it[12] and under it.[13] More particularly it has been said that the subject matter of an action to quiet title is the title, and not the land, and that the interest to be quieted is in the title.[14] A reversionary interest may be protected against an easement by a suit to quiet title under some statutes, especially when the adverse party is claiming a title in fee.[15] The term "real property" has been held to include incorporeal hereditaments,[16] such as water rights[17] and easements in land.[18]

On the other hand, it has been held that an incorporeal hereditament is not a proper subject of equitable jurisdiction to quiet title;[19] and it has also been held that the right to control navigable waters is not determinable in a suit to quiet title because it is not a right of property but of sovereign power vested in the federal government.[20]

Ordinarily the subject matter of the action does not extend to personal property[21] unless the statute expressly so declares;[22] but in some jurisdictions, without any express provision therefor, or at least without any express reference to statutes, the action has been sustained as applied to personalty,[23] and, even in jurisdictions in which the general rule has been followed, it has been held that equity will give relief in respect of personalty in unusual cases,[24] where, owing to exceptional circumstances, there is no adequate remedy at law.[25]

B. MATTERS AFFECTING RIGHT TO REMEDY GENERALLY

§ 9. In General

The exercise of the jurisdiction of the court in actions to quiet title or remove a cloud does not rest on arbitrary rules but depends largely on the discretion of the court and the facts of the particular case.

Jurisdiction in actions to quiet title or remove a cloud does not rest on arbitrary rules; much depends on the facts of the particular case, and in the exercise of the jurisdiction the court is clothed with a large discretion,[26] where there is any doubt whether there is such a cloud that injury may reasonably be apprehended therefrom,[27] and will exercise its jurisdiction with great caution.[28] A court of equity cannot, on pretense of settling or quieting title, review the decision of an inferior court on a matter within its jurisdiction,[29] nor will equity take jurisdiction of a bill merely seeking advice as to the character and extent of plaintiff's title.[30] Where the judgment in an action to remove a cloud cannot conclude or bind a party claiming under the adverse title, the action must fail.[31] A purchaser at a foreclosure sale[32] or at a sale by a guardian or administrator[33] cannot maintain an action to quiet title against infant defendants therein whose right to appeal from the judgment has not expired.

A cloud on title which justifies the intervention of a court of equity is one which complainant has not created and placed himself under personal obligation to remove.[34] A plaintiff seeking to quiet title may be denied relief if his conduct, in the light of his own intelligence and information, was manifestly unreasonable.[35] However, there is no such conclusive presumption of an owner's knowledge of the state of his own title as will necessarily preclude him from having his title quieted as against an interest obtained from him by fraudulent misrepresentations as to the extent of his ownership.[36] Further, a purchaser who has paid the true consideration for the deed may be granted a judgment declaring that there was no lien on the property for nonpayment of any part of the consideration notwithstanding, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, he could have learned of an error in the deed with respect to the recital of consideration.[37]

Mistake in connection with deed or contract. Where, by mistake, a deed conveyed only a part of the land intended to be conveyed, but the grantor received the full value of the entire tract, those claiming under the deed were entitled to have their title quieted as to the part not mentioned in the deed.[38] So it has been held that, where a quitclaim deed by mistake failed to convey the property intended, the grantee, after requesting the execution of another quitclaim deed, may sue under the statute to quiet title to the land intended to be conveyed,[39] although an action to reform the deed might more properly be brought.[40] A material mistake in connection with the execution of a contract for the sale of land, the contract having been recorded, may warrant quieting title to the land as against the contract.[41]

§ 10. Adequacy of Legal Remedies

a. In general
b. Adequacy of particular remedies

a. In General

An action in equity to quiet title or remove a cloud will not lie where there is an adequate remedy at law which is as efficient to the ends of justice as the remedy sought in equity.

The well-established principle of equity jurisprudence that a court of equity will not entertain jurisdiction where there is an adequate remedy at law applies to actions to quiet title or remove a cloud.[42] Thus the bill will not be entertained merely to afford protective relief when plaintiff is under no disability to bring suit to test the question of title.[43] However, in order to deprive equity of jurisdiction to quiet title or remove a cloud, it is not enough that there is a remedy at law; the remedy must be plain and adequate, and, as frequently stated, equity may take jurisdiction where there is no complete and adequate legal remedy.[44] The other

Contract of sale after execution of lease

Owner of land could not petition a court of equity to remove a cloud on title which he voluntarily placed there by giving a contract for sale of the land whereby he obligated himself to quiet title and thereupon to execute and deliver a deed conveying property to purchaser, after having previously executed a grazing lease.—Epletveit v. Solberg, supra.

Failure to make inquiry

Purchasers being charged with knowledge of the law could not assume that marginal release on record of prior mortgage meant that mortgage had been satisfied to extent that lien thereof was destroyed, but marginal release only served to put them on further inquiry, and not having inquired by searching record further, they were not entitled to equitable aid in their action to quiet title against holder of renewal note and mortgage.—Marialke v. Correction of irregularity by motion

Where apparent irregularity of judgment might be corrected on motion in the cause in which it was rendered or execution might there be recalled, the remedies available were apparently adequate and judgment debtor was not entitled to maintain action to remove cloud on title and have transcript removed from docket.—Holden v. Tatton, 35 S.E.2d 615, 225 N.C. 558.

Vacation of judgment

Where execution plaintiff in law action became purchaser at sheriff's sale, and court had authority to vacate allegedly invalid judgment and enter one for defendant, fact that court allegedly could not set aside sheriff's deed was held not to render legal remedy inadequate so as to authorize defendant to sue in equity to remove cloud on title Anderson v. remedy, in order to deprive equity of jurisdiction, must be as practicable and efficient to the ends of justice as the remedy in equity.[45]

While jurisdiction to quiet title or remove a cloud should be exercised whether plaintiff is in or out of possession, where he holds the equitable title, as discussed infra § 28, a plaintiff out of possession holding the legal title will be left to his remedy by ejectment under ordinary circumstances, as discussed infra § 27. However, when he is in possession, and thus unable to obtain adequate relief by ejectment or other legal remedy, he may resort to equity for relief.[46] The equitable jurisdiction of a federal court to remove a cloud from title will not be divested because there is a local statute which affords a legal remedy.[47]

Effect of statutes on general rule. Statutes which give a right of action to quiet title only to the party in possession have no effect on the rule that the aid of equity cannot be invoked where an adequate remedy at law exists.[48] Likewise, statutes which extend equitable relief to claimants of unoccupied lands in no wise interfere with the general rule that equity jurisdiction cannot be invoked where an adequate remedy at law exists;[49] but if there is no adequate remedy at law an action under the statute to quiet title will lie.[50] As to statutes permitting an action to quiet title to be maintained by a person not in possession, if such statutes be regarded as giving an absolute right to the equitable remedy where an adequate remedy at law exists, the effect is to deprive the party in possession of the right to trial by jury,[51] and they are therefore unconstitutional.[52] Some of the decisions follow the statute, without raising or discussing the question of its effect on the right of trial by jury, where, under the common law, the remedy would have been at law,[53] while others hold, where the question is squarely presented, that, although equitable in form, the action is not strictly equitable, and that, where there are legal issues, the parties demanding it may have such issues framed for a jury.[54]

Waiver of defense. So far as the parties themselves are concerned, the defense that there is an adequate remedy at law may be waived by failure to object.[55] However, this rule does not apply where the subject matter of the litigation and the character of the relief are foreign to the power of a court of equity.[56]

b. Adequacy of Particular Remedies

(1) Ejectment
(2) Other remedies

(1) Ejectment

A party will be left to his remedy by ejectment where such remedy is plain, adequate, and complete; but he may sue in equity to quiet title where ejectment will not lie because he is in possession and holds the legal title.

The remedy by ejectment is generally regarded as plain, adequate, and complete, and a party ordinarily will be left to that remedy when it exists.[57] Thus, as discussed infra § 27, where the title is purely a legal one, and defendant is in possession, the remedy at law in the nature of an action of ejectment is usually regarded as plain, adequate, and complete. However, if the circumstances are such that the remedy by ejectment is inadequate, equity has jurisdiction.[58] Where plaintiff is in possession and holds the legal title, so that ejectment will not lie, he may sue in equity to quiet title,[59] and even where the statute authorizes a person in possession of real property to maintain ejectment it has been held that one in actual possession under a superior title may sue in equity to remove a cloud from the title.[60]

Ejectment barred by limitations. Where plaintiff is out of possession, and his right to maintain ejectment is barred by the statute of limitations, a court of equity will not grant a decree quieting his title, such relief being without value when plaintiff cannot recover possession under the title.[61]

(2) Other Remedies

Equity will decline to interfere where there is an adequate remedy by way of writ of entry, trespass to try title, unlawful detainer, or an action for damages.

Generally, where plaintiff may resort to the remedy at law by a writ of entry,[62] or by an action of trespass to try title,[63] or unlawful detainer,[64] such remedies are regarded as plain, adequate, and complete, and equity will decline to interfere; and this is also true where relief may be had in an action to recover damages.[65]

On the other hand, a landowner who seeks to quiet title as against a claim of right of way for a public highway cannot be required to resort to the statutory remedy for abandonment or vacation of a lawfully established highway.[66] Where a mortgagee retains a mortgage which has been paid, asserting that a release given by him is invalid, the mortgagor has no adequate remedy by action at law for slander of title.[67]

Defenses available at law. The owner of land in possession may sue to quiet his title, notwithstanding he may have a defense in a court of law[68] unless such defense is as practical and efficient as the remedy in equity.[69] It has been held that a statute authorizing an action for the purpose of determining an adverse claim to money or property on an alleged obligation does not provide a method for litigating a personal cause of action which plaintiff anticipates may be brought against him, since he has an adequate remedy at law by his day in court when sued.[70]

§ 11. Previous Establishment of Title at Law

The plaintiff ordinarily must have established his title in an action at law before equity will entertain a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud; but under some circumstances or statutes the necessity of a prior establishment of title at law is obviated.

The general rule is that equitable jurisdiction to quiet or remove cloud on title will not be exercised where the parties are not numerous unless it clearly appears that plaintiff has fully and fairly established his title in an action at law.[71] However, an exception has been made where the right is founded on undisputed evidence or long-continued possession[72] or where plaintiff has not been dispossessed or his possession interrupted so as to give him an opportunity of trying his right.[73] Moreover, some authorities have made a distinction in this respect between an action to quiet title and one to remove a cloud, and have held that equity has jurisdiction to remove a cloud where plaintiff is in possession under the better title, although he has not vindicated it at law.[74]

Effect of statutes. The general rule as to the necessity of establishing title at law is held to be abrogated by a statute providing that any person in possession of realty may maintain a suit in equity against another who claims an estate or interest therein adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such claim, estate, or interest,[75] and the same effect has been given to statutes authorizing the action to be maintained by a plaintiff out of possession.[76]

C. WHAT CONSTITUTES CLOUD ON TITLE

§ 12. Existing Cloud

In general, a cloud is the semblance of a title or interest which, although in fact unfounded, nevertheless appears to be valid and casts a doubt on the validity of the record title.

A cloud, such as equity will undertake to remove, is the semblance of a title, either legal or equitable, or a claim of an interest in lands appearing in some legal form, but which is in fact unfounded and which it would be inequitable to enforce;[77] an outstanding claim or encumbrance which, if valid, would affect or impair the title of the owner of a particular estate, and which apparently and on its face has that effect, but which can be shown by extrinsic proof to be invalid or inapplicable to the estate in question.[78] It is something which constitutes an apparent encumbrance on the title or an apparent defect in it;[79] some claim which is apparently valid but which is actually invalid;[80] a semblance of title which is, in fact, unfounded and which casts a doubt on the validity of the record title;[81] something which shows prima facie some right of a third person either to the whole or some interest in the title.[82] The fact that an invalid claim is not actively asserted does not preclude the quieting of title as against it.[83]

Verbal claim or assertion of rights. Except where the statute has enlarged the jurisdiction of equity so as to authorize actions to quiet title against persons asserting any adverse claim, as discussed infra § 38, a mere verbal claim or assertion of ownership or rights in realty does not constitute a cloud on title.[84] However, a cloud is created where defendant's position in respect of the written instrument of record under which he claims is manifested by verbal statements.[85]

A valid claim, which may be enforced in law or in equity, does not cast a cloud on title.[86]

§ 13. —— Necessary Attributes

Equity will not interfere to remove as a cloud on title an instrument or claim the invalidity of which appears on its face or is established conclusively by matters of record; but if the claim is such as to cause a reasonable fear that it may be asserted against the owner injuriously equity takes jurisdiction.

It is generally held that a claim, in order to constitute a cloud on title, must be apparently valid,[87]

Other definitions

(1) A cloud on title is something, such as a mortgage, deed, or other instrument, which can be pointed out, and which, as a semblance of title, either legal or equitable, has some appearance of casting a valid objection over true owner's title.—Parker v. Vallerand, 8 A.2d 594, 136 Me. 519.

(2) An instrument in the possession of another, which injures a title, depreciates the market value of the property, and is of such mischievous character that a prospective purchaser would hesitate to purchase, is a cloud on the title.—Anderson v. Guenther, 25 P.2d 146, 144 Or. 446.

and that equity will not interfere to remove a cloud on title where the invalidity of the instrument or claim complained of appears on its face,[88] or is established conclusively by matters of record,[89] or where extrinsic facts must be proved for the purpose of establishing its validity,[90] or where the party claiming under it must, in order to recover thereon, necessarily offer evidence inevitably showing its invalidity and destroying its effect.[91] As has been said, some color of title in defendant must be shown in order to constitute a cloud.[92] However, equity will grant relief where the instrument or claim of defendant appears to be valid on its face, and plaintiff, in order to show its invalidity, would be compelled to offer extrinsic evidence,[93] especially if such evidence rests in parol, and is liable to be lost through lapse of time or otherwise.[94]

It has been said that the true test in determining whether or not an instrument or claim constitutes a cloud on title is: Would the owner of the property in an action at law brought by the adverse party, founded on the instrument or claim, be required to offer evidence to defeat a recovery? If such proof would be necessary the cloud would exist; if the proof would be unnecessary, no shade would be cast by the presence of the instrument or claim.[95] The doctrine asserted in some cases is that, if the defect or invalidity is not apparent to the ordinary searcher, but is such as to require legal acumen to discover it, whether it appears on the face of the instrument or record or has to be proved aliunde, the jurisdiction of equity may be invoked to remove the cloud.[96] Where the deed or other instrument sought to be set aside is a mere nullity, but, left in an uncanceled state, may be a cloud on title, it is immaterial whether it was originally invalid by reason of extrinsic facts[97] or has become insufficient by reason of subsequent events not impeaching its original validity, but only destroying its future operation.[98]

The justice of the rule that an instrument or claim void on its face does not constitute a cloud on title has been questioned in some cases,[99] and some authorities have held that equity has jurisdiction to cancel a void instrument whether or not its character as such appears on its face.[1]

Substantial character. The magnitude of the apparent defect in the title is immaterial;[2] it is sufficient if the adverse claim has a tendency, even in a slight degree, to cast a doubt on the owner's title.[3] Nevertheless, the alleged cloud must be prima facie substantial[4] and cast such a suspicion on the title or interest to which it is hostile[5] as will injuriously affect the market value of the property[6] or seriously embarrass the owner either in disposing of the property[7] or in maintaining his rights.[8] An idle or groundless suspicion or baseless fear is not sufficient to warrant the cancellation of an instrument as a cloud on title.[9] In other words, if the claim constituting the alleged cloud is such as to cause a reasonable fear that it may at some time be asserted against the owner vexatiously or injuriously, equity has jurisdiction;[10] but, if the instrument or claim complained of is not one which, presently, or in the future, will embarrass plaintiff or endanger his title, equity will refuse to entertain the suit.[11]

a. In General

General rules apply in determining whether a particular instrument or matter constitutes a cloud on title.

General rules apply in determining whether particular instruments or matters constitute a cloud on title.[12] So-called caveats filed in the land records, which state that plaintiff had no lawful claim to the property, but which in fact are neither caveats nor lis pendens, have been held to constitute clouds on plaintiff's title.[13]

Administrator's sale. Where a sale of estate lands by an administrator is void and the conveyance discloses its invalidity, it casts no cloud on title of which equity will take cognizance.[14] Likewise, a sale of land by an administrator without an order of the probate court,[15] or under an order which is void for want of jurisdiction,[16] is not such a cloud on title as will justify the interference of a court of equity. However, where an administrator's deed, although fraudulently executed, is by statute made prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings prior to the sale, it creates a cloud on the title of an heir, which he may have removed by proceedings in equity.[17]

to remove all liens and encumbrances, if any, created by proceedings in attachment, and so to quiet their title, equity has jurisdiction[18] However, where attachment proceedings are void on their face, they do not constitute a cloud on the title.[19] An action to remove a cloud on title will not lie in favor of one claiming perfect title to lands against another attaching it as the property of a third person, since it does not constitute a cloud on title.[20] Where a statute provides for cancellation of an instrument when there is a reasonable apprehension that, if left outstanding, it may cause injury to one against whom it is void, but declares that the provision shall not apply to an instrument the invalidity of which is apparent on its face, an attachment against the owner of buildings on land belonging to another is not ground for an action to remove a cloud on the title, if it constitutes no lien because improperly levied.[21]

Dower claims. When the invalidity of a claim of dower in land does not appear on the record, but can only be shown by extrinsic evidence, a bill in equity to remove such claim as a cloud on title will lie;[22] and this applies to an inchoate right of dower,[23] especially under statutes enlarging the jurisdiction of equity.[24]

Easements. An unfounded claim of an easement may cast a cloud on the title of the servient estate;[25] and, where defendant has claimed certain easements with respect to land, the fact that plaintiff might establish that the purported easements do not actually exist does not deprive chancery of its jurisdiction.[26]

Judicial proceedings in general. Where a valid objection appears on the face of proceedings at law through which the adverse party can alone claim title to plaintiff's land,[27] or where the invalidity of the proceedings would be manifest on the proof which a claimant under such proceedings would be compelled to make in support of his claim,[28] there is not in law such a cloud on the title as to give equity jurisdiction to set aside the proceedings; but, where the claim of the adverse party to the land is valid on the face of proceeding sought to be set aside, and extrinsic facts are necessary to show their invalidity, a case is made out for the interference of equity.[29] Title may be quieted as against one claiming title under foreclosure proceedings which purported to, but which did not in fact, divest the owner of title.[30] The filing of a suit to quiet title is not a cloud on defendant's title which will warrant the court in granting him affirmative relief, where the amended answer praying for such relief sets up only matters which could be urged in defense of the pending suit.[31]

Leases and contracts therefor. The general rules as to what constitute clouds on title apply to leases and contracts to lease.[32] Whenever proof of extrinsic facts is necessary to establish that an outstanding lease, regular on its face, was invalid at its inception,[33] or, although originally valid, has, by subsequent events, become functus officio,[34] it constitutes a cloud on title. The same instrument may create both the title and the cloud thereon.[35] Thus a provision in a long-term lease which the lessor asserts denies the lessee the right to replace buildings thereon, and which is susceptible of such construction, is a cloud on the lessee's title.[36] However, there is no cloud on title where a lease or contract therefor is void on its face,[37] or where extrinsic facts must be proved in order to establish its validity.[38] A lease or contract therefor which is valid and enforceable is not a cloud on the lessor's title.[39]

Lis pendens. An owner or lessee of real estate is entitled to maintain a suit to set aside a lis pendens as a cloud on his title,[40] unless he purchased pending the suit from the person against whom the decree was rendered.[41]

Mechanics' liens. A mechanic's lien, apparently valid on its face and requiring extrinsic evidence to show its invalidity, constitutes a cloud on title.[42] So equity will remove a cloud on the title caused by the record of a mechanic's lien which has become forfeited by the lien claimant's failure to institute foreclosure proceedings.[43]

Trusts. Where a trust is apparently valid and the facts necessary to show its invalidity must be proved by extrinsic evidence, it constitutes a cloud on title.[44] However, an instrument creating a trust is not a cloud on title where its invalidity appears on its face.[45] So no cloud on title is created by a paper recorded in a registry of deeds, giving notice that certain realty is claimed to be a trust, in favor of the signer and others, and that he will dispute any title which the holder of the present title will attempt to give.[46] On the other hand, it has been held that the existence of an instrument creating a valid trust, once capable of execution, but which has become incapable of execution by reason of the death of the person having the power of appointment, without exercising such power, does not present a proper case for the exercise of equitable jurisdiction because of the necessity of resorting to extrinsic evidence to establish the extinguishment of the power.[47]

Although the court will ordinarily refuse to decree a conveyance from a nominal trustee to one who purchases from the beneficiary, as being a cloud on the purchaser's title, in cases where the legal estate is vested in the beneficiary by force of law,[48] when a nominal trust beclouds the title and embarrasses the rights of alienation, a conveyance will be decreed.[49]

b. Contract or Option for Purchase of Land

A contract or option for the purchase of land, at least if recorded and apparently valid, may constitute a cloud on title; but, if void on its face, it does not constitute a cloud.

A contract for the sale of land may constitute a cloud on title against which the landowner may be entitled to have his title quieted.[50] Thus, where a recorded contract is not void on its face, and its invalidity can be shown only by extrinsic evidence,[51] as where a contract placed in escrow is wrongfully recorded,[52] it is a cloud on title which equity has jurisdiction to remove; and this applies to a contract which was originally valid but has become inoperative by abandonment, forfeiture, or other subsequent event.[53] However, if a recorded executory contract for sale of land is void on its face,[54] or its invalidity will necessarily appear in the proceeding by one claiming under it and attempting its enforcement,[55] it does not constitute a cloud on title. Title will not be quieted as against a contract of purchase on the ground of a default of the purchaser under the contract where the vendor had waived the right to declare a forfeiture because of such default.[56]

An option to purchase land, filed for record, is a cloud on the title of the owner where it has not been exercised within the time and in the manner provided therein.[57] An unacknowledged contract of option or sale signed by a married woman concerning her separate property, and the public record thereof, may constitute such a cloud on her title as will entitle her to maintain a bill for its removal, although such instrument was not entitled to be recorded.[58]

An unrecorded contract for the sale or exchange of lands ordinarily is not a cloud on the title.[59] However, a bona fide purchaser of land without knowledge of an outstanding unrecorded contract for the sale of the land has been held entitled to have his title quieted as against any claims under the unrecorded contract.[60]

Forged assignment of a contract to buy land, recorded by the assignee, constitutes a cloud on the title of the person whose signature was forged, entitling him to have his title quieted by a cancellation of the assignment.[61]

c. Deeds

An outstanding deed, apparently valid, but in fact invalid because of fraud, duress, undue influence, forgery, or other reason, generally constitutes a cloud on title justifying the intervention of equity.

Where a deed is apparently valid, and its invalidity can be shown only by the introduction of extrinsic evidence, it is a cloud on title justifying the intervention of equity,[62] notwithstanding such

Deed in hands of third person

Equity may declare deed in hands of third person claiming no interest therein void as against grantor, where delivery would only constitute deed would not support an action in ejectment.[63] A deed valid on its face constitutes a cloud on title if delivered, although it was not recorded;[64] and the record of an apparently valid deed is a cloud on title although it was not delivered.[65] If a deed, apparently valid on its face, is in reality based on an illegal consideration, it constitutes a cloud on title.[66]

A deed executed by an agent under a power not coupled with an interest, after the death of the principal, but antedated, constitutes a cloud on title which a court of equity will remove.[67] A deed which, originally valid, becomes inoperative by subsequent events is a cloud on title.[68] So, where a conveyance has been rescinded by redelivery of the deed to the grantor and unequivocal acts of abandonment on the part of the grantee, the deed constitutes a cloud on the grantor's title which equity will remove.[69] Alteration of a deed by the grantor after its delivery to a third person for the grantee, by the insertion of the name of an additional grantee, creates a cloud on the title of the original grantee;[70] and the same is true where the grantor's agent to whom a deed was delivered for delivery to the grantee on completion of payments erased the latter's name and inserted the name of a new grantee without the knowledge or authority of the grantor.[71]

Although, in some jurisdictions, equity has assumed jurisdiction to cancel deeds void on their face,[72] it is generally held that a conveyance, in order to be a cloud on title, must constitute an apparent title, and that equity will not intervene to cancel or remove as a cloud on title a deed which is void on its face;[73] nor will equity intervene, even though the invalidity does not appear on the face of the deed, if the invalidity necessarily appears in some of the links of title which one claiming under the deed would have to establish in order to give it force and effect.[74] If a deed describes the land so indefinitely as to render it void on its face, it does not constitute a cloud which equity will remove.[75] Equity will not interfere where the purpose of the deed is clear and it cannot operate presently or in the future to the injury of the true owner.[76] A deed executed by a mere stranger to the title does not constitute a cloud thereon,[77] at least under ordinary circumstances;[78] but this rule is not of universal application.[79]

Inoperative reservation

Where deed reserved "the graveyard situated on" the realty, to be used as a burial place by the grantor and his heirs with free ingress and egress, and grantor was not buried on the realty and no graveyard could be found thereon, and there was no evidence that bodies were ever interred there, reservation was inoperative, and cloud on title of the realty as result of the reservation, was removed.—McDonough v. Availability of other remedies

The alleged fact that innocent purchaser for value without notice of prior unrecorded deed could have rescinded the purchase from his grantor and could have been restored to status quo, or could have proceeded against his grantor for breach of warranty, did not preclude him from maintaining an action to quiet title against the grantees of the unrecorded deed.—Freligh v. Where all parties agreed that a deed conveyed the bare legal title for specific purpose of enabling grantee to qualify as surety on bond and that purpose for which legal title was conveyed had been accomplished and reason for holding legal title in such manner had ceased to exist since grantee had been discharged as surety, court did not err in canceling deed.—Whitaker v. Creation of doubt in reasonably prudent man

Chancery will remove cloud cast by deed of stranger if pretension under circumstances would create doubt in mind of reasonably prudent man.—Homewood Realty Corporation v. Safe Deposit & Trust Co. of Baltimore, supra.

Fraud, duress, or undue influence. A deed valid on its face, but in fact fraudulent,[80] or procured by undue influence,[81] or duress,[82] is a cloud on the title of the true owner which equity will remove, although the fraud becomes immaterial where defendant relies on a valid sheriff's deed on foreclosure, and not on the fraudulent deed.[83] So a conveyance in fraud of the grantor's creditors is a cloud on the title obtained through appropriate proceedings by the creditors to enforce their debts.[84] On the other hand, it has been held that, where a debtor conveys land with intent to defraud his creditors, and they proceed to have the land sold, treating the conveyance as void, one who purchases at the execution sale is not entitled to come into equity to have the fraudulent deed brought in and canceled as a cloud on his title.[85] A deed, apparently valid, need not have been procured by fraud in order to warrant setting it aside as a cloud on title.[86]

Forgery; false certificate. A forged deed, regular and valid on its face,[87] and which has been recorded,[88] may be canceled in equity as a cloud on the title of the true owner. An action can be maintained to cancel as a cloud on title a forged deed which has been recorded on the strength of a false certificate of acknowledgment made by one duly authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds.[89]

Failure to perform conditions precedent. Generally, a contract imposing a burden on, or vesting a right in, land on performance of a condition precedent under which, because of failure to perform the condition, no right, title, or interest has vested or ever can vest, will be canceled as a cloud on the owner's title.[90] When an instrument in the form of a conveyance on condition precedent has been recorded by the grantee, who is asserting rights thereunder, although no estate ever vested in him because the condition was not performed, these facts resting on extrinsic evidence, equity will decree a cancellation at the instance of the grantor.[91] So, too, where the grantee in a deed containing a condition precedent has failed to comply with the terms of the grant, or has abandoned the estate, and the grantor is in possession, the latter may maintain a bill in equity to cancel the deed as a cloud on title.[92]

Delivery in escrow. A deed made in the course of negotiations for the sale of land, delivered only as an escrow and by some means finding its way on the record,[93] either by accident or mistake,[94] or through fraud,[95] is such a cloud on the grantor's title as will entitle him to have it canceled on the failure of the negotiations.

Including lands by mistake. Equity will quiet title to that part of a tract of land included by a mistake in a conveyance regular on its face,[96] at least, where complainant and his grantors have remained in possession ever since the conveyance was made.[97] On the other hand, it has been held that a mistake in the description of land, insufficient to defeat the grantee's legal title, does not constitute a cloud which will justify a resort to equity.[98]

equity will remove.[99] So a building restriction which has become unenforceable because of changed conditions in the use of the land for the benefit of which it was established may be removed as a cloud on title.[1] On the other hand, it has been held that a court of equity will not cancel building restrictions merely because the property, by reason of changed conditions, would be more valuable if put to uses prohibited by the restrictions.[2]

d. Execution Sale

An apparently valid execution sale, the invalidity of which can be shown only by extrinsic proof, may constitute a cloud on title which equity will remove.

A bill in equity will lie to remove as a cloud on title a sale of land under execution, where such sale is apparently valid and its invalidity can be shown only by extrinsic proof;[3] and this is so, even though a court of law has subsequently vacated the sale.[4] So, it has been held that a sale on execution against a lessee for years who had assigned his term, when purporting to convey the entire title, is a cloud on title,[5] as is a sale on execution against one who had a contract for the purchase of the land, but had forfeited his rights thereunder at the time of the levy.[6] However, equity will not ordinarily grant relief where the proceedings are void on their face, and, hence, do not affect plaintiff's property or require him to resort to extrinsic evidence to show their invalidity;[7] and it is generally held that a sale of lands on execution against one who never had any title thereto or interest therein will not cast a cloud on the title of the true owner.[8] A sale under a valid judgment does not constitute a cloud on title.[9]

Time of sale. Where a party sells land under execution as the property of his debtor, with either actual or constructive notice of a bona fide sale and conveyance to another before the judgment became a lien,[10] or, where a landowner purchased the land from the execution defendant after the levy and before an invalid sale thereunder,[11] the owner may have the execution sale set aside as a cloud on his title. The redemption of land from an execution sale by a judgment creditor who has no lien or levy thereon is ineffectual as against one who purchased the lands of the judgment debtor after the original levy and prior to the sale thereunder, and the purchaser may maintain a bill to remove the cloud occasioned by the claim of such creditor.[12]

Homestead property. The sale of a homestead under an execution forms a cloud on the title to the homestead which a court of equity will remove.[13] However, a sheriff's deed conveying part of the remainder interest in land does not constitute a cloud on the title of one holding a homestead in a life estate in the land.[14]

Curtesy. Where a husband's estate by curtesy is sold under execution, the wife cannot sue to set aside the sale as a cloud on her title, until the husband's estate has been extinguished by his death or otherwise.[15]

e. Foreclosure Sale

A sale under a foreclosure decree does not constitute a cloud on title where the foreclosure proceedings are void on their face, but it does constitute a cloud where the invalidity of the proceedings can be shown only by a resort to extrinsic evidence.

A sale under a decree in a suit to foreclosure a mortgage[16] or mechanic's lien[17] does not constitute a cloud on title where the foreclosure proceedings are void on their face, as where defendant in proceedings to foreclose a mechanic's lien had no title or interest in the property,[18] or where there is a sale under a mortgage of land not included therein;[19] but the rule is otherwise where the foreclosure proceedings are apparently valid on their face, and their invalidity can be shown only by resort to extrinsic evidence.[20]

An ambiguous description in a foreclosure decree and in a commissioner's deed given thereunder may result in a cloud on the title to land which was not included in the mortgage.[21] Where a party obtains a judgment by scire facias on foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure notes which have been paid by taking new notes and a mortgage, and purchases the mortgaged premises, a portion of which he had previously released from the mortgage lien, equity will set aside the conveyance as a cloud on the title of a subsequent purchaser of the premises.[22] A minor remainderman who joined in a deed of trust which was subsequently foreclosed was held not entitled to have the foreclosure deed removed as a cloud on the ground of the inadequacy of the bid where, in view of the expectancy of the life tenant and the possible defeat of the remainderman's interest by his predeceasing the life tenant, the remainderman's interest was of small market value.[23]

Payment or tender of amount due. Where a mortgage debt had been paid at the time of foreclosure, the mortgagor may have the sale set aside as a cloud on title, provided he is in possession;[24] but, if not in possession, the equitable remedy is not available, since the remedy at law by an action of ejectment is adequate.[25] Where plaintiff, before expiration of the time for redemption, has tendered the amount required to redeem,[26] or has paid the amount due, and the purchaser refuses to execute the necessary certificate,[27] an action may be brought to quiet plaintiff's title and remove the cloud created thereon by the foreclosure sale.

f. Judgments or Decrees

A judgment or decree, the invalidity of which can be shown only by extrinsic evidence, constitutes a cloud on title; but a judgment void on its face ordinarily will not be removed as a cloud.

An action in equity will lie to cancel a judgment or decree which is an apparent cloud on the title to land,[28] as where the invalidity of a judgment or decree is not apparent on its face, but can be shown only by extrinsic evidence;[29] and this applies to a judgment which has been paid or satisfied but not discharged of record.[30] A judgment lien barred by limitations may constitute a cloud on title so as to entitle the owner to have his title quieted.[31]

A judgment or decree void on its face carries its own condemnation with it, and is not a cloud on title,[32] although there is authority to the contrary.[33] A decree which is not a cloud on title when entered cannot become such by mere lapse of time.[34] Equity will not quiet title as against a judgment for irregularity or defect in service of process, in the absence of a showing that plaintiff had a defense on the merits, or that the judgment was not in fact

just,[35] especially where limitations have run against the note on which judgment was recovered.[36] A decree affecting land, in a suit between strangers to the true title, does not constitute a cloud on the title of the true owner.[37] So a judgment against one who has made a general assignment for creditors, valid by state laws, and rendered before an assignee in bankruptcy has procured the assignment to be set aside, is not a cloud on the title of the assignee under the general assignment.[38]

Homesteads. Homesteaders may quiet their title to the homestead as against a judgment which is not effective as a lien against the homestead property because of the judgment creditor's failure to comply with statutory provisions;[39] and it is not a prerequisite to an action by the owner of a homestead to remove clouds on his title, consisting of recorded judgments, that the creditors were threatening execution on the homestead.[40] On the other hand, it has been held that the mere filing of an abstract of judgment does not of itself create any cloud on the title to homestead property.[41]

Purchaser of land from trustee in bankruptcy may remove as a cloud on title an invalid judgment lien, without showing that the judgment was unjust, and without paying it.[42]

Rights of sureties of principal judgment debtor. Where a creditor releases the property of the debtor held under levy of execution, the debtor's sureties may compel the creditor to execute a release of the judgment lien, as to their real estate, as a cloud on title.[43]

Determination. In determining whether a supplemental decree in proceedings to foreclose a tax lien is a cloud on title, it must be examined in connection with all the other pleadings in such proceedings, both original and supplemental.[44]

g. Mortgages

A mortgage, the invalidity of which appears on its face or as a matter of record, generally does not constitute a cloud justifying the intervention of equity; but a mortgage constitutes a cloud which equity will remove where its invalidity must be proved by extrinsic circumstances.

Although a contrary rule obtains in some jurisdictions,[45] a mortgage which is invalid on its face,[46] or the invalidity of which is a matter of record,[47] or will appear from the proof which the mortgagee must reasonably make in order to establish it,[48] does not ordinarily constitute a cloud on title justifying the intervention of equity, although the right to have a mortgage canceled as a cloud will not be denied because it is not enforceable without resort to extrinsic evidence, where such evidence is required to supply a mere insufficiency, and does not go to the validity of the mortgage.[49] So a mortgage given by one who has no title whatever is a nullity, and does not constitute a cloud on the title of the true owner under equity rules.[50] However, a mortgage or deed of trust, valid on its face, and requiring proof of extrinsic circumstances to show its invalidity, constitutes a cloud on title which equity will remove;[51] and this is so whether the mortgage was, in its inception, not a valid lien on the property covered by it,[52] or has since ceased to be a valid lien,[53] as where the consideration has failed,[54] or the secured debt has been paid or the mortgage otherwise satisfied.[55] A mortgage which appears by record as a first mortgage, but is in fact subordinate to a lien for unpaid purchase money, constitutes a cloud on the title.[56]

A deed of trust which is binding on the grantor cannot be declared void as a cloud on title at the instance of one whose rights are derived from, and are no stronger than, those of the grantor.[57] Where a vendee, knowing of an adverse claim against his vendor, takes a deed with covenant of title, and gives a mortgage not to be due until the vendor shall procure a quitclaim deed from the adverse claimant, which is not done within the time stipulated, the mortgage is not a cloud on the vendee's title.[58]

Forged mortgage is a cloud on title which equity will remove.[59]

Right of redemption. A purchaser at a mortgage foreclosure sale may maintain an action to quiet title against the mortgagor's statutory right of redemption which has been forfeited by the mortgagor's refusal to deliver possession on demand.[60]

Purchasers acquiring land subject to an existing trust deed are not entitled to have the deed canceled as a cloud on title on the ground that it was without consideration.[61]

Partial invalidity. Where the statute renders an obligation given to secure a usurious note invalid only to the extent of the interest, a mortgage given to secure such a note will not be canceled as a cloud on the mortgagor's title.[62]

Barred by statute of limitations. An action to quiet title against the holder of a mortgage, on the naked ground that the right to foreclose the mortgage is barred by limitations, is not maintainable,[63] unless the right to such an action is given by statute.[64] However, where a debt secured by a deed of trust was conclusively presumed to have been paid because of the failure of the holder of the indebtedness to file the necessary writings or make the necessary entries, within the time limited by statute, the owner of the property was held entitled to have the deed of trust removed as a cloud on title.[65] Further, a person seeking to quiet title to land may interpose the bar of the statute against a mortgagee defendant seeking in such action to foreclose his mortgage lien.[66]

h. Taxes and Assessments

(1) In general
(2) Sale thereunder

(1) In General

A cloud on title is created by a tax or assessment which, although in fact invalid, appears authorized and regular, necessitating extrinsic proof to establish its invalidity; but an assessment which is invalid on its face will not justify the intervention of equity.

Taxes or assessments may create a cloud on title, as where a tax or an assessment is really invalid, but apparently authorized and regular, and extrinsic proof must be made to show its invalidity,[67] particularly if such extrinsic proof affects the jurisdiction of the taxing authorities;[68] and this rule applies where the assessment roll is made presumptive evidence of the regularity of the proceedings.[69] However, where the invalidity of the assessment appears on the face of the proceeding,[70] or where the defect will necessarily appear in any proceedings which the party claiming under the lien of the assessment must produce to establish his title,[71] the assessment does not constitute such a cloud on title as to justify equitable relief. Plaintiff is not bound to rest on one ground of invalidity, and if other grounds, not apparent on the face of the proceedings, are also alleged, relief may be had,[72] and it has been held that equity will grant relief where the invalidity does not appear wholly on the face of the record, but is shown in part by extrinsic evidence.[73] The purchaser at the foreclosure sale of a superior lien has been held entitled to the removal of a cloud on title created by a junior lien for taxes.[74]

Legal acumen theory. It has been held by some authorities that, if the defect in the assessment is such as to require legal acumen to discover it, whether it appears on the face of the proceedings or is to be proved aliunde, equity will set aside the assessment as a cloud on title.[75]

Valid lien for taxes,[76] or one that is valid to any extent,[77] does not constitute a cloud on title.

(2) Sale Thereunder

A sale for taxes or assessments, or a certificate or deed given pursuant thereto, constitutes a cloud on title if it is apparently valid and requires extrinsic evidence to prove its invalidity; but, if the sale, deed, or certificate is void on its face, equity will not intervene.

A sale for taxes and assessments is not such a cloud on title as will authorize equitable intervention to set it aside, where the defects rendering it invalid appear on the face of the proceedings,[78] or would necessarily be exposed by the proof required from one claiming under it in proceedings to establish his claim.[79] However, if the sale is apparently valid, and extrinsic evidence is necessary to show its invalidity, equity will give relief.[80]

Certificate or deed. An invalid tax deed or certificate of sale or delinquency may constitute a cloud on title,[81] as where the certificate or deed is valid

on its face, and resort to extrinsic evidence is necessary to show its invalidity,[82] or where the statute makes the certificate or deed presumptive or prima facie evidence of the validity and regularity of the previous proceedings.[83] The rule is inapplicable, however, where the certificate or deed is prima facie evidence only of the facts contained therein, and not of the regularity of the preliminary proceedings leading thereto.[84] The record owner of land sold for taxes who has redeemed the land from the sale in the manner provided by statute may maintain an action to quiet title against the holder of the tax certificate in possession.[85]

A certificate of sale or tax deed does not constitute a cloud on title where it is void on its face,[86] or where it is defective for want of preliminary proceedings which the party claiming under it would be bound to show,[87] although in some jurisdictions a tax deed has been held a cloud on title, even though it is void on its face.[88] A record title cut off in tax proceedings is not a cloud on the title acquired through such proceedings, and a bill in equity cannot be maintained for the sole purpose of declaring the validity of a tax deed by quieting the tax title against the former record title on the theory that the mere existence of the latter casts a cloud on the former,[89] at least where there has been no attempt subsequent to the issuance of the tax deed to assert the record title.[90]

Lease given on sale. Where the statute makes a lease given on the sale of land for assessments presumptive evidence of the regularity of the sale and all proceedings prior thereto, such a lease, although in fact invalid for irregularity in the prior proceedings, is an apparent cloud on the title of the land which it purports to lease, and the owner may maintain a suit in equity to set it aside.[91]

i. Wills and Contracts to Devise

An apparently valid will may create a cloud on title; but a will which is void on its face is generally held not to create such cloud. An oral contract to devise land is not a cloud on title.

A cloud on title is not created by a will, or a provision thereof, which is void on its face,[92] although a contrary rule obtains in some jurisdictions.[93] A will not probated is not a cloud on title.[94] On the other hand, a will valid on its face and requiring extrinsic evidence to establish its invalidity is a cloud on title which equity will remove;[95] and, where a will devising land is executed under such conditions as to be irrevocable, a subsequent will, inconsistent therewith, may be adjudged void as a cloud on title at the suit of those claiming under the original devise.[96] A devise of specific property which testator had conveyed in his lifetime by valid deed may be a cloud on the title of the grantee.[97] A will not describing any particular property will not be set aside in equity, before probate, as a cloud on title because of an adverse claim asserted to some of the property devised.[98]

Inconsistent descriptions. Where a will dividing lands between two devisees contains two inconsistent and contradictory descriptions of the land, a claim set up under the invalid description is a cloud on the title of that part of the land against which it is asserted.[99]

Devisee in a will may sue to quiet title on the ground that the will is invalid because of testator's minority, and that it is a cloud on the devisee's title as testator's heir, although such devisee was a proponent of the will and the decree admitting it to probate recited that testator was of full age when he executed it.[1]

Contract to devise land is not a cloud on title if it is not in writing.[2]

§ 15. Apprehended or Threatened Cloud

a. In general
b. Sale

a. In General

Equity may give relief against an apprehended or threatened cloud on title where the danger is not merely speculative; but it will not intervene where the threatened act, if completed, would not cast a cloud on title.

A court of equity will restrain a defendant from proceeding in an illegal act which, if completed, will necessarily cast a cloud on plaintiff's title.[3] Otherwise stated, if the facts are such that a court would remove the cloud when cast,[4] and there is a fixed determination to create a cloud, the danger not being merely speculative and potential,[5] the court will give preventive relief. On the other hand, such relief cannot be had where the threatened act, if completed, would not cast a cloud on title.[6] The determination to create a cloud must clearly appear,[7] and it is not sufficient that the danger is merely speculative.[8]

There is a threat to create a cloud which equity may interfere to prevent whenever an instrument or claim exists which the holder may so utilize as to convert it into a cloud on title by his own action, and he refuses to surrender it and thus put an end to this power.[9] It has been held that, as a rule, an injunction will be granted to prevent a cloud when the evidence on which plaintiff's right depends is not of record or shown in the papers through which the right depends.[10]

Levy for taxes. A court of equity has power to enjoin the taxing authorities from making an unlawful levy[11] or from issuing an invalid tax bill against plaintiff's land[12] which will result in casting a cloud on the title; but an injunction does not lie where a levy, if made, would be void on its face.[13]

Execution of lease. Injunction will not lie to prevent one in possession of land under claim of title as against another claimant, who is in no way connected with him in estate, from executing a lease on the ground that it will be a cloud on such other claimant's title.[14] However, if a lease made pursuant to a sale for an unpaid street assessment is by law evidence of the regularity of the sale, the making of such lease will be restrained in case of substantial irregularity.[15]

Proceedings at law. It has been held that a court of equity may restrain proceedings at law which would tend to cast a cloud on the title to realty,[16] but should not interfere until there is imminent danger of a cloud being cast by some impending wrongful result of the action.[17] A suit by a commissioner of school lands, instituted for the direct benefit of the state to raise revenue for school purposes by the sale of its lands, will not be restrained at the instance of an adverse claimant to the land who alleges that title may be clouded by the suit.[18]

b. Sale

Equity may prevent a wrongful sale of land, such as a sale to enforce an invalid assessment for taxes, where such sale will result in casting a cloud on the title of the real owner.

It is well settled that equity will interfere by injunction to prevent the wrongful sale of land where such sale will result in casting a cloud on the title of the real owner of the property,[19] although no title would in fact pass to the purchaser at the sale.[20] However, where a sale, if consummated, would not cast a cloud, equity will not give preventive relief.[21] So, it has been held that a sale of land as the property of one from whom the owner in no way derived his title presents no ground for equitable interference,[22] as where a married woman seeks to enjoin a sale, under judicial process against her husband, of lands belonging exclusively to her separate estate.[23] Where a cloud to be cast on title exists only on the supposition of an incorrect legal view being taken of facts which are latent, equity will not enjoin a sale of land on the ground of a threatened cloud on title.[24]

By conveyance under pretense of right. Equity will interfere to prevent the giving of a conveyance of realty, under pretense of right, which will operate as a cloud on title.[25] However, in order to constitute such a cloud on title as would warrant equity in restraining the giving of a deed, it must appear that the owner of the property in an action by the adverse party, founded on the deed, would have to offer evidence to defeat a recovery.[26] Where a deed has never been recorded because of its destruction or loss,[27] or because of defects in the acknowledgment which prevent its being recorded,[28] a sale by the grantor or his legal representative will be restrained at the instance of the grantee in whom title has vested. The recordation of a quitclaim deed of land to which the grantor had no title will be enjoined where it appears that the purpose of the recordation was to cloud plaintiff's title.[29]

On the other hand, an injunction will be refused where complainant is in possession and has a good record title,[30] where his rights depend on the construction of recorded instruments,[31] where the party sought to be enjoined has apparent title to the property on which he resides,[32] or where purchasers buy at their peril.[33] Likewise, where the filing of a lis pendens will protect complainant, no injunction will be granted against a threatened wrongful sale of land on the ground of preventing a cloud on title.[34]

Under invalid assessment. Where a sale to enforce an invalid assessment for taxes would cast a cloud on title, equity will intervene to prevent the sale or the issuance of a deed thereunder;[35] and this rule applies where, by statute, such conveyance is presumptive evidence of title.[36] On the other hand, where the proceedings resulting in the assessment are void, and a deed after sale of the property would on its face be void and cast no cloud on the true title, its execution will not be enjoined as a threatened cloud.[37] It has been held that the fact that an assessment for constructing a sidewalk is made a lien on the adjacent property does not create such a cloud on title as will confer equitable jurisdiction to restrain the collection of an illegal assessment, where it does not appear that property had been levied on, or that a levy had been authorized, or that anything had been done which would cause irreparable injury or lead to a multiplicity of suits.[38] A sale cannot be enjoined merely because of the unauthorized and untrue statement of a city official that it would be without the right of redemption.[39]

Of land purchased at tax sale. An injunction to prevent, as a threatened cloud on title, the sale of land previously purchased at a tax sale, on the ground that the tax sale passed no title, will be refused, since such mischief has already been done by the first sale.[40]

Under mortgage. A sale under a mortgage will be enjoined by a court of equity where it will result in casting a cloud on plaintiff's title.[41] However, a sale under a mortgage of land not included therein cannot cast a cloud on the title of the owner, as discussed supra § 14 e, and will not, therefore, be restrained as a threatened cloud on title.[42] A party who has by fraud obtained possession of land by a deed absolute on its face, but intended only as a mortgage, will be restrained from selling it.[43] beneficial interest, ordinarily may maintain an action to quiet title thereto or to remove a cloud thereon.

The holder of the legal title to property,[46] even though he holds merely a naked legal title, without any beneficial interest,[47] ordinarily may maintain an action to quiet title thereto or to remove a cloud thereon. Under the original equity jurisdiction and statutes which have not changed the rule, plaintiff may not maintain an action unless he has legal title,[48] or, as held in some jurisdictions, a legal and equitable title, connected with possession.[49]

On the other hand, it has been held that in order to bring such an action plaintiff need not have a legal title provided he has some interest therein,[50] and that a legal title is not necessary where plaintiff has some equitable right not redressable in a court of law, and the removal of a cloud is only incidental to the primary relief sought.[51] Furthermore, under the broad terms of many of the statutes enlarging equitable jurisdiction, as discussed supra § 6, such action may also be brought by one having only an equitable title to the property in controversy,[52] even as against one holding the legal title,[53] although in some jurisdictions the rule has not been relaxed to the extent of permitting the owner of an equitable interest to sue the holder of the legal title.[54] Where defendant is estopped to attack the validity of plaintiff's title shown by a deed from the county, fair on its face, and good against all the world except the former fee owner, plaintiff's title is sufficient to maintain the action.[55]

What constitutes legal title

Term "legal title" within rule requiring such title for maintenance of suit to remove cloud from title has no absolute or strict legal meaning and may mean full and absolute title or apparent right of ownership with beneficial or equitable title in another and is not necessarily record title.—Barnes v. Boyd, D.C.W.Va., 8 F.Supp. 584, affirmed, C.C.A., 78 F. 2d 910, certiorari denied 55 S.Ct. 550, 294 U.S. 723, 79 L.Ed. 1254, rehearing denied 55 S.Ct. 647, 295 U.S. 768, 79 L.Ed. 1708.

Rule inapplicable

(1) Mortgagee is not legal title holder, whom equitable owner may not sue to quiet title. Turner v. Deacon, 289 P. 179, 106 Cal.App. 329.

(2) Where plaintiff in action to quiet title claims and trial court finds that no trust was created, and that plaintiff is owner of both legal and equitable title, the text rule is inapplicable and plaintiff may maintain action to quiet title against adverse claim.—Bauer v. defendant.[59] On the other hand, since an action to quiet title will not be defeated by a showing that plaintiff's interest, otherwise sufficient to support the action, is subject to possibly superior rights of persons who are not parties to the suit,[60] the rule has been laid down that plaintiff need not show a title good as against the whole world, but only as against defendant.[61] The defendant may not create a superior title in himself through plaintiff's alleged fraud on plaintiff's predecessor in title.[62]

Title or interest in third person. The general rule that one must be the owner of the property in order to maintain an action has no application where a person unlawfully obtains a deed from a trustee as a purchaser from him, holds such deed as a monument of his title, and nevertheless resists the efforts of a cestui que trust to have the illegal deed canceled by attempting to set up an outstanding title in a third person.[63] One seeking to establish title to realty is not entitled to recover on a showing that another than defendant may have an interest in the property in question.[64]

c. Extent of Interest; Particular Estates or Interests in General

The interest of plaintiff which will entitle him to maintain an action to quiet title or to remove a cloud thereon may be an interest less than a fee.

The interest of plaintiff which will entitle him to maintain an action to quiet title or remove a cloud may be an interest less than a fee,[65] such as an interest in reversion in realty[66] or an estate for life.[67] Various persons or entities have been held to have sufficient title or interest in property to maintain an action to quiet title to such property or to remove a cloud thereon,[68] such as assignees in insolvency,[69] and one or more cotenants.[70] On the other hand, various persons have been held to have insufficient title or interest in property to maintain such an action.[71] Thus, it has been held that a life tenant may not have his title quieted as to his right to convey a fee,[72] although, should the life tenant exercise such power, his grantee or the remainderman might sue in a proper case.[73] Furthermore, a land owner, merely because of a right to lateral support of land in its natural state, has been held to have no such interest in the title to adjoining land as will give him a right of action to quiet title.[74]

§ 18. —— Title Founded on Possession

Under many statutes providing for actions for the determination of adverse claims, it has been held that one in possession of, and claiming title to, land may maintain an action to quiet title thereto or to remove a cloud thereon, without other evidence of title.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, it is a general rule that mere naked possession, unconnected with a legal or equitable title, is insufficient to confer a right of action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon;[75] but under many statutes

Where will, which created trust and failed to dispose of the corpus remaining after determination of life estates, directed conversion of testator's realty into money or securities, executrix and sole beneficiary under will of testator's deceased nephew who was beneficiary and heir at law of testator had no such interest in realty as would entitle her to maintain action for determination of her interest in reversion in corpus.—Ransom v. Mellor, supra.

Title or actual possession

The action must be based on either title or actual possession.—May v. Abernathy, 130 S.W.2d 135, 23 Tenn. App. 236—51 C.J. p 172 note 93 [c].

In California

(1) Under the present statute, mere possession, unless it reaches the dignity of a prescriptive title, has been held insufficient to support the action.—City of Burlingame v. Norberg, 290 P. 587, 210 Cal. 195—Langstaff v. Mitchell, 6 P.2d 546, 119 Cal.App. 407.

(2) Under an earlier statute, possession under claim of ownership was sufficient to authorize an action against trespasser or one who established no title in himself.—Bond v. Aickley, 141 P. 1138, 168 Cal. 161—51 C.J. p 173 note 96 [e].

providing for actions for the determination of adverse claims, it has been held that one in possession of,[76] and claiming title to,[77] land may maintain the action without other evidence of title.

Adverse possession. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[78] the general rule is that, where title is claimed by plaintiff in good faith, accompanied by actual and adverse possession of the property for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations, no more is required to support the action,[79] even though such action is against the holder of the paper title,[80] who has not used his title to disturb plaintiff.[81] Where neither party has such possession as to perfect title under the statute of limitations, their rights have been held to depend on the question of the better paper title.[82]

§ 19. —— Title Derived from Common Source

In a suit to quiet title to property or to remove a cloud thereon, where both parties to the controversy claim title from a common source, plaintiff should deraign his title from the grantor under whom both parties claim, and he is not required to go back of the common source.

In a suit to quiet title to property or to remove a cloud thereon, where both parties to the controversy claim title from a common source, plaintiff should deraign his title from the grantor under whom both parties claim, and he is not required to go back of the common source,[83] since it is presumed that the

Existence of several quitclaim deeds in chains of title of parties to action to quiet title, where first deed in such chains was a grant, did not

title of the grantor traced back to the government.[84] In fact neither party need go back of the common source,[85] nor may either one question the title of the common grantor.[86] The rule that plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, as discussed supra § 17 b, is inapplicable where the parties trace their respective titles to a common source.[87] In such a case, the only question is who has the better title from the common source,[88] and plaintiff need not show a title good as against the whole world, but only as against defendant,[89] and the one who has the superior title or equity must prevail.[90] Where a statute declares that a conveyance shall be void as against a subsequent purchaser in good faith, whose conveyance is first recorded, it has been held that an action to quiet title may not be maintained by one claiming under a quitclaim deed recorded before, but given subsequent to, a deed to defendant from the same grantor, where plaintiff did not purchase in good faith.[91]

What constitutes common source. Whether or not the parties to a controversy claim title from a common source so as to make the common grantor rule applicable depends on the facts and circumstances of the case.[92] The title may be from a common source, although the land involved includes uplands and filled-in or made land adjacent thereto.[93] So, where defendant claims through a tax deed based on sales for taxes levied while plaintiff's grantor was the owner, such grantor is the common source of title.[94] However, title is not shown to be from a common source where plaintiff's deed is from one grantor and defendant's from the same grantor and another.[95]

§ 20. —— Record or Paper Title

The general rule is that, where reliance is placed solely on paper title, the chain thereof must be from the government, or from the original patentee, or from some grantor in possession, but plaintiff may be entitled to maintain an action to quiet title or to remove a cloud thereon although he does not have a perfect record title.

The general rule is that, where reliance is placed solely on paper title, the chain thereof must be, and is sufficient when it is, from the government, or from the original patentee,[96] or from some grantor

Where location of property line only question
In equity action between adjoining landowners to quiet title, where there was no contention but that defendant owned realty on one side of line and that plaintiffs owned realty on other side of line, and only contention was true location of line, defendant who filed counterclaim, in order to prevail, was not required to trace title from commonwealth.—

in possession,[97] unless, as discussed supra § 19, both parties claim under a common source. Plaintiff may be entitled to maintain an action to quiet title or to remove a cloud thereon although he does not have a perfect record title,[98] and a technical objection to the chain of title made out by plaintiff may be met by curing the defect.[99] Furthermore it has been held that plaintiff is not bound to show a perfect title from the government or as against the world, but only as against the holder of the alleged cloud,[1] and that it is sufficient for plaintiff to show that he claims through one who procured a judicial decree of ownership and right to possession against the very persons who are defendants in the instant action.[2]

In a suit to quiet title plaintiff ordinarily may claim only under his deed,[3] and a deed which is void for indefiniteness, as far as a record title is concerned, may not support an action to quiet title based on a record title,[4] but unimportant discrepancies in the deeds in the chain of title have been held not to constitute missing links or breaks in the chain.[5]

A defective deed may be sufficient to enable plaintiff to sue where the defect is due to a mistake against which the law would afford relief;[6] and even where the deed does not cover the land in dispute, and plaintiff does not present a case entitling him to reformation of such deed, the infirmity may be cured by conveyance of his grantor's interest to him before commencement of the action.[7] An unrecorded deed, where such facts are shown to have put anyone who was dealing with the estate on notice, is sufficient on which to base an action to quiet title.[8] So it has been held that a tax deed is sufficient evidence of title to sustain such action, even though not witnessed,[9] and a deed which may not be recorded because not acknowledged or witnessed has been held sufficient to sustain an action by the grantee against the grantor's heirs.[10] Under a statute providing that, where two or more persons claim land by recorded title and neither one is in actual possession, either may bring a suit to establish title, where plaintiff in such a suit claims title by inheritance, nothing more in the form of a recorded title may be required of plaintiff than that the title which his ancestor had, and which he inherited, is a recorded title.[11]

Deed conveying the remaining part of southeast quarter of southeast quarter of designated section not formerly sold and owned by named persons was void for indefiniteness in so far as record title was concerned and would not support a recovery by grantee on record title either in ejectment action or suit to quiet title, since record did not show what land was ever sold to or owned by parties named as excluded.—Thomason v. Waggoner, Tex.Civ.App., 191 S.W.2d 892, refused no reversible error.

Where husband after marriage acquired patent to land from government and presumption existed that he and his wife were living together in community and title was recorded in husband's name when community was dissolved by death of wife, property was presumed to have been community property inuring to the benefit of husband and wife, and husband having recorded title wife had recorded title also, with respect to heirs' right to bring suit to estab-

Quitclaim. An action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon ordinarily may be based on a quitclaim deed.[12] So one who has a quitclaim deed from one in possession may sue to quiet title where, at the time of the giving of the deed, there was an existing statutory provision that such deed should be sufficient to convey all the estate which could lawfully be conveyed by a deed of bargain and sale.[13] One receiving a quitclaim deed to certain property as well as a sheriff's deed thereto may, in a proper case, be entitled to have his title to such property quieted.[14] However, a quitclaim deed from a grantor who had no title[15] or who was not in possession[16] at the time it was executed is insufficient, although the invalidity of a quitclaim deed is immaterial where plaintiff claims by inheritance from the grantor.[17]

§ 21. —— Vendors and Purchasers

a. Vendors
b. Purchasers

a. Vendors

(1) In general
(2) Conveyance under covenant of warranty

(1) In General

A mere contract to convey land will not divest a vendor of his right to maintain an action to quiet title thereto or to remove a cloud thereon where the legal title remains in him, but one who has sold and actually disposed of all his interest in property ordinarily may not maintain an action to quiet title thereto.

A mere contract to convey land will not divest a vendor of his right to maintain an action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon where the legal title remains in him,[18] and this rule applies where the vendor has received no part of the consideration.[19] Also, one who signs a deed to land owned by him may be entitled to maintain a suit to quiet title to such property where the deed has not been delivered,[20] and a vendor retaining a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money, in jurisdiction where such fact gives him the superior title, may sue to cancel as clouds on his title deeds from his grantor to defendant.[21] One who conveys land but retains possession of accretions thereto may properly maintain a suit to quiet title to the accretions in himself as against persons who prove no interest in, or title to, the accreted lands, where the purchaser disclaims an interest in such lands.[22]

On the other hand, one who has sold and actually disposed of all his interest in property ordinarily may not maintain an action to quiet title thereto.[23] Thus, although a sale of land by the owner pending a bill by him to quiet title has been held not to defeat the action,[24] as a general rule, one who has sold and actually conveyed land may not, subsequent to such conveyance, maintain a bill to quiet title thereto in himself,[25] according to the authorities on the lish title under statute.—Smith v. Courtney, 192 So. 528, 193 La. 910.

Reason for rule

A quitclaim deed is sufficient to convey interest of grantors to grantees so as to entitle them to maintain action to quiet title, since quitclaim deed is closely related to simple release, but is recognized as distinct form of conveyance and operates like any other deed to extent of transferring whatever title or interest grantor has.—Thornton v. Middletown Educational Corporation, 70 P.2d 234, 21 Cal.App.2d 707.

Abandonment of contract or breach of condition

(1) On abandonment of contract or breach of condition by vendee, the vendor, being still the owner of the legal title, may sue to protect it.—Snodgrass v. Parks, 21 P. 429, 79 Cal. 55—51 C.J. p 176 note 53 [b].

(2) Where vendee may be deemed to have abandoned the contract so as to enable vendor to treat contract as forfeited and terminated in accordance with its terms, the vendor may take proper steps in equity to obtain removal of cloud on his title by cancellation of public record of such contract.—Realty Securities Corporation v. Johnson, 111 So. 532, 93 Fla. 46.

Effect of vendor's deed to third person

Vendor under contract for sale of lot was not precluded from maintaining quiet-title suit against vendee on ground that vendor was not real party in interest because vendor had conveyed lot to third person after execution of contract and before commencement of suit, where vendor and third person executed contemporaneous agreement stipulating that deed was delivered to third person as security for loan, and reconveyance had been made to vendor, and date of reconveyance was not shown.—Hacienda Homes v. question, even though he is in possession,[26] and although the grantee, pending suit by the grantor to quiet title against a third person, redelivers the deed to the grantor on condition that the grantee shall own the land on the successful termination of the suit.[27] Where an owner of realty by express trust conveys such property to a trustee so as to vest the whole estate in the trustee, primarily for the purpose of sale, and incidentally for the purpose of security, an action to quiet title or to remove a cloud thereon may not lie in favor of the original owner of the property or one claiming under him.[28]

Deed delivered in escrow. The grantor in a deed delivered in escrow may bring an action to remove a cloud from title before the condition on which delivery to the grantee is to be made has been performed.[29]

(2) Conveyance under Covenant of Warranty

There is authority to the effect that a vendor who, in conveying land, has warranted the title or contracted to perfect it, may be entitled to sue to quiet title, but there is also authority to the effect that a vendor, after conveyance, may not maintain the action, even though he has warranted the title or agreed to procure the discharge of an apparent lien thereon.

There is authority to the effect that a vendor who, in conveying land, has warranted the title or contracted to perfect it,[30] where evidence is about to be lost or the vendee's inertia would result in the perfecting of an adverse title,[31] may sue to quiet title. So it has been held that a vendor who has conveyed by warranty deed, but holds a lien to secure the purchase price, may maintain a bill to quiet title in his vendee as against invalid claims, although his title at the time of the conveyance was merely equitable.[32] On the other hand, there is also authority to the effect that a vendor, after conveyance, may not maintain the action, even though he has warranted the title[33] or agreed to procure the discharge of an apparent lien thereon.[34]

In any event the vendor may not sue where his liability on the covenant of warranty has terminated.[35] So where the warrantor of a title executes at the request of the warrantee an instrument which may injure the title, the warrantor is not thereby made liable on his covenant of warranty, and, hence, may not maintain a bill in equity to clear the title from such instrument, without allegation and proof that the warrantee, on request, refused to move in the matter.[36]

b. Purchasers

(1) In general

(2) At execution or judicial sale generally

(3) At foreclosure sale

(1) In General

In some jurisdictions, a vendee under an executory contract of sale may not maintain a bill to quiet title, but in other jurisdictions a vendee under such a contract may maintain such an action, as may his assignee.

In those jurisdictions where none but a legal title suffices, as discussed supra § 17, a vendee under an executory contract of sale may not maintain a bill to quiet title.[37] So also, where an equitable title is sufficient as against persons claiming equities, but insufficient as against the holder of the legal title, one claiming under an executory contract of sale may not sue the vendor to quiet title.[38] However, where an equitable title is sufficient to bring an action to quiet title, a vendee under such a contract, being considered as having the equitable estate, usually may maintain the action,[39] as may his assignee,[40] although it has been held that the action may not be maintained by a vendee who has not paid the purchase money, so as to entitle him to go at

Where a son of an intestate surrendered his interest in the intestate's land to plaintiff, his brother, on condition that the latter support their mother during her life, and plaintiff takes possession, he may not, until completion of his contract, maintain a suit to remove a cloud on the title against creditors of the brother levying execution on the latter's legal title,[42] although his possession under the contract will be protected until such time as his equitable interest entitles him to specific performance of such contract.[43] Where a purchaser under a contract of sale assigns his interest and the assignee of such interest agrees with another to sell him the property described in the contract, the one agreeing to purchase the land from the assignee has been held to have no title in the land which may be quieted.[44]

Purchaser receiving defective conveyance. A purchaser for value to whom a defective conveyance has been made and who has a right to call for the legal title may maintain a bill to quiet his title as against his grantor,[45] and he may also quiet title as against a subsequent purchaser for value, with notice of the prior equitable right.[46] One who, by reason of a mutual mistake, accepts a deed of less than the full amount of acreage intended to be conveyed, but who goes into possession of the full acreage, has been held entitled to have his title quieted as against one, not an innocent purchaser without notice, who purchased realty which included the acreage omitted from the deed.[47] On the other hand, the grantee in a deed to a homestead in which the husband did not join has been held not entitled to maintain a suit to quiet title against the grantor's creditor who purchased the land under a judgment in his favor.[48]

Deed delivered in escrow. Where land is sold under a valid contract and a deed is executed and placed in escrow, to be delivered on payment of the purchase money, the equitable title passes at once to the grantee, and he may maintain an action to quiet title.[49]

(2) At Execution or Judicial Sale Generally

Ordinarily, a person deducing his title to lands through a judicial or an execution sale may maintain an action to quiet title to such lands, except where the proceedings which were the basis of such sale, and on which complainant's title depends, are shown to be void.

Ordinarily a person deducing his title to lands through a judicial or an execution sale may maintain an action to quiet title to such lands,[50] except where the proceedings which were the basis of such sale, and on which the validity of complainant's title depends, are, for jurisdictional defects[51] or for fraud,[52] shown to be void, or where the sale was on a judgment and it is shown that the debt on which the judgment was obtained had been fully paid before the commencement of the action.[53] Where a sale in partition has not been reported or confirmed, and no deed has been delivered, a purchaser at such sale has been held not entitled to maintain an action to remove a cloud on the title to the lands purchased.[54]

(3) At Foreclosure Sale

Although one in possession, under color of foreclosure, may be able to maintain an action to quiet his title against strangers to the equity of redemption, without proving his title, where a mortgagor has no title to the land, and the purchaser at foreclosure takes with notice, an action by the latter to quiet title must fail.

A person in possession, under color of foreclosure, may maintain an action to quiet his title against strangers to the equity of redemption, without proving his title;[55] but where a mortgagor has no title to the land, and the purchaser at foreclosure sale takes with notice, an action by the latter to quiet title must fail,[56] irrespective of any question whether the rights of the owner's representatives are barred by the statute of limitations by virtue of their having discovered the fraud by which mortgagor secured the apparent title;[57] and relief has been denied one who purchased at foreclosure sale for a grossly inadequate price.[58]

Grantee or assignee of purchaser. Where a mortgagee purchases at a foreclosure sale, although the sale is not confirmed, a person to whom his rights are conveyed may bring an action against the holder of a tax deed on the premises under a statute authorizing the holder of a lien to prosecute an action to test the legality of adverse claims.[59] However, the assignee of a purchaser at foreclosure sale, whose representations that the time for redemption would be extended caused the mortgagor to forego his right to redeem, is not entitled to a decree quieting title in a suit by the mortgagor to quiet his title, although such representations were made without consideration.[60]

One who forecloses under a junior mortgage and acquires the legal title may not assert a lien under a prior mortgage in an action to quiet title based on the title acquired by such foreclosure.[61]

§ 22. —— Creditors

An attaching creditor or a judgment creditor may be entitled to maintain an action to quiet title or to remove a cloud thereon.

An attaching creditor has sufficient title in the property attached to sustain a bill to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon.[62] Moreover, one who has recovered judgment at law and levied his execution on the only realty of defendant is entitled to a bill in chancery to quiet title to or remove a cloud from such real estate,[63] although it has also been held that a judgment creditor may not maintain an action to quiet title in the absence of a levy of execution or a decree specifically attaching a lien to particular property.[64]

Estate creditors. A creditor of an estate has no interest such as will enable him to maintain an action to quiet title to the estate lands,[65] except by leave of court, after refusal of the administrator to bring suit.[66] However, equity will intervene to remove a cloud on the title to decedent's realty, his estate having been represented insolvent, in favor of a creditor who has obtained a judgment against the administrator, and to subject the land to payment of his debts.[67]

§ 23. —— Homestead, Dower, or Leasehold Interests

Ordinarily, a homestead, dower, or leasehold interest constitutes a sufficient interest to enable the holder thereof to bring an action to quiet title or to remove a cloud thereon.

Ordinarily, an action may be brought by the holder of a homestead interest to quiet title or to remove a cloud thereon.[68] An inchoate right of dower has been held to be such an interest in land as will enable a wife to bring an action to remove a cloud thereon.[69] Thus where, by statute, a widow's right of dower is a vendable interest, it has been held that she may sue to quiet title[70] without having elected between dower and her statutory rights.[71]

Leasehold interests. While under some statutory provisions, a tenant may not be able to maintain a statutory action to quiet title as against the owner of the fee,[72] ordinarily, one in possession of lands under a lease may maintain a suit to quiet title against another claiming possession under another lease[73] or against an adverse claim by the owner

Children of owner

(1) Under some statutory provisions, it has been held that children of deceased owner of homestead, who also left a widow, may maintain an action to have their title determined. —Naiman v. Rohlmeyer, 150 N.W. 829, 97 Neb. 551.

(2) However, it has also been held that a daughter is not entitled to cancellation of divorce decree entered in favor of wife against deceased husband during his lifetime as cloud on daughter's title and right to use of homestead occupied by mother and father prior to divorce on ground that court was without jurisdiction to enter divorce decree. of the fee[74] Thus, it has been held that a lessee under a lease for a fixed period, renewable forever, who has exercised an election to renew and offered to pay all arrears of rent due, may maintain an action quieting his title to a permanent leasehold.[75]

§ 24. —— Interest as Mortgagor or Mortgagee

a. Interest as mortgagor
b. Interest as mortgagee

a. Interest as Mortgagor

In a jurisdiction where the legal title remains in the mortgagor, a mortgagor in possession has been held entitled to bring an action to quiet title against the mortgagee asserting legal title to the land.

In a jurisdiction where the legal title remains in the mortgagor, a mortgagor in possession may maintain an action to quiet title against the mortgagee asserting legal title to the land.[76] Furthermore, it has been held that a grantor of a trust deed to realty given as security may be entitled to bring an action to quiet title to such property.[77] Also, where title to property is held by a person named by a creditor holding possession under a contract to reconvey when reimbursed for his expenditures, an action to quiet the debtor's title may lie when the creditor has been fully reimbursed.[78] A statute providing that, when an action to enforce a mortgage is barred by the statute of limitations, the owner of the land may maintain an action to quiet title and to have the cloud removed applies where a deed given as security was made directly to the creditor by one who held the title for the debtor.[79]

After foreclosure. As a result of the foreclosure of a mortgage, the mortgagor, or one claiming under him, may be divested of such title or interest in the property covered by the mortgage as would enable him to maintain an action to quiet title thereto.[80] So a mortgagor who has failed to redeem within the statutory period, and does not ask to redeem after the expiration of such period, or allege any facts entitling him to do so, has no title to quiet.[81]

b. Interest as Mortgagee

While in some jurisdictions, a mortgagee or his assignee has been held to have sufficient title or interest in the property involved to maintain a suit to quiet title thereto as against adverse claims, in other jurisdictions, it has been held that such an action ordinarily may not be brought by the mortgagee.

In those jurisdictions where a mortgage is regarded as passing the whole legal title to the property, a mortgagee[82] or his assignee[83] has sufficient title or interest in the property involved to maintain a suit to quiet title thereto as against adverse claims. However, in those jurisdictions where a mortgage is not regarded as passing the legal title to the property, and an equitable title in plaintiff is not sufficient to support an action to quiet title, it has been held that such an action may not ordinarily be maintained by the mortgagee.[84] So also, where a mortgage does not create any estate or interest in real property, a mortgagee may not bring the action,[85] and this is true where, under the statute, a mortgage conveys no title, legal or equitable, to the property described.[86] It has also been held that the

Where right to redeem from tax sale passed
Where mortgagor's right to redeem from tax sale passed to mortgagees by virtue of foreclosure decree, mortgagor had no right or interest which could pass by deed, so as to permit grantee thereunder to maintain action to quiet title against mortgagees and purchasers at foreclosure sale whose right to redeem from tax sale had not terminated.—Potter v. grantee in a deed, absolute in form but in fact an equitable mortgage, may not maintain a bill to set aside as a cloud on title a subsequent deed from his grantor.[87]

On the other hand, where either a legal or equitable interest is sufficient to authorize the action, an action to quiet title against adverse claims may be brought by a mortgagee, although the mortgage gave him merely a lien on the property,[88] and this is true where the statute authorizes an action by the "holder of any lien or incumbrance on land, although not having legal title or possession."[89] So it has been held that a trustee in a mortgage, who has not the legal title entitling him to possession, may sue to cancel deeds of adverse claimants in possession, where he has no adequate remedy at law.[90]

A mortgagee, under a purchase-money mortgage, may not bring a suit to quiet title to the property involved, on default of the purchaser, under a statute providing that a mortgage of realty shall not be deemed a conveyance, whatever its terms, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession of the property without foreclosure and sale.[91] Also, where a statute declares that there shall be but one action for enforcement of any right secured by mortgage, it has been held that a mortgagee's remedy against the mortgagor is not by action to quiet title, but by suit to foreclose,[92] although it has also been held that one who has the status of a mortgagee-trustee may prosecute an action to quiet title to the mortgaged property, on the failure of the mortgagor-beneficiary to pay sums advanced, and that he is not required to bring an action to foreclose the security.[93] Under some statutory provisions, plaintiff is the beneficial owner of land entitled to maintain an action to quiet title thereto and not relegated to the remedy of foreclosing his mortgage where, with the intent to execute a specific plan to sell the land, he transfers the immediate title to the property to a selling agent who executes a note and mortgage back to plaintiff to facilitate that purpose, and the selling agent retains title thereto in violation of the contract on termination of the agency.[94]

After conveyance, with warranty of title, by mortgagee. A mortgagee, after conveying the mortgaged premises with a warranty of title, may sue to relieve the premises from a cloud affecting his rights under the mortgage, and thereby protect the title conveyed and warranted.[95]

§ 25. —— Easements

Under some statutory provisions the holder of an easement has been held to have the right to bring an action to quiet title, but under other statutory provisions such right has been held not to exist.

The holder of an easement has been held to have the right to bring an action to quiet title under a statute giving a right of action to anyone in peaceable possession of lands and claiming to own them.[96] However, a statute providing for an action to determine the validity of adverse claims by one in possession of a freehold estate has been held not to include a party in the enjoyment of an easement,[97] and the same rule has been held to apply to an action under a statute providing that an action may be brought by one claiming land in fee, or for life, or for a term of years not less than a stated number of years.[98]

Reason for rule

Where mortgage of property conveyed by plaintiffs to their selling agent was not intended to secure an obligation to pay plaintiffs for the property conveyed but to constructively notify third parties of plaintiffs' interest, fact that plaintiffs held the mortgage was immaterial with respect to plaintiffs' right to maintain action to quiet title against their selling agent, and in such case where plaintiffs' selling agent holding legal title and another possessed no equity in property remaining unsold for which the selling agent had executed mortgage to plaintiffs, selling agent was not entitled to customary mortgagor's period of redemption, so that there was no injustice in permitting plaintiffs to enforce their summary contractual remedy of forfeiture by action to quiet title instead of requiring them to foreclose their mortgage. E. POSSESSION OF PLAINTIFF

§ 26. Necessity

The necessity that plaintiff have possession of the property in order to maintain a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon is discussed infra §§ 27–31.

§ 27. —— When Title or Interest Legal

a. In general
b. Exceptions

a. In General

As a general rule, possession of the land by the plaintiff is prerequisite to his maintenance of a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud on title.

As a general rule, a holder of the legal title to lands must, in order to maintain an action to quiet title or remove cloud, be in possession of the land when the action is instituted,[99] since, where defendant is in possession, the remedy at law by action of ejectment ordinarily affords a plain, adequate, and complete remedy;[1] but in some states which have no separate legal and equitable jurisdictions, and in which the courts may give either legal or equitable relief as the facts demand, an action to quiet title or remove a cloud on title may be brought by a person out of possession.[2] Under some statutes plaintiff must have actual or constructive possession.[3] Want of possession is not excused by

Right to trial by jury

Where the title is purely a legal one and defendant is in possession, the remedy at law is plain, adequate, and complete, and an action of ejectment cannot be maintained under a guise of a bill in equity to quiet title or remove a cloud. In such case the adverse party has a constitutional right to trial by jury.—Winkle v. School Dist. No. 81, Independence County, Ark., 221 S.W.2d 884, 215 Ark. 670—Lowe v. the hardship of taking possession.[4] However, in an equitable proceeding to remove a specific cloud from the title, possession has been held not necessary.[5]

Admission of want of possession. The bringing of ejectment in a federal court is not an admission by plaintiff that he is not in possession of the land, so as to preclude him from maintaining a suit to remove a cloud on title, where the law of the state in which the federal court is located does not require a person to be out of possession in order to maintain ejectment.[6]

b. Exceptions

(1) In general
(2) Existence of other equitable grounds for relief
(3) Holders of future estates

(1) In General

The rule requiring the plaintiff to be in possession of the land in order to maintain a suit to quiet title is subject to exception where special circumstances warrant a departure, as where a plaintiff out of possession is permitted to sue because his legal remedy is inadequate.

The rule requiring plaintiff to be in possession of land before he may bring suit to quiet title thereto or remove a cloud on the title thereof, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, is subject to certain exceptions where special circumstances warrant a departure from the general rule.[7] Such an action will lie without plaintiff's possession of the land when plaintiff holds the legal title under such circumstances that there is no adequate remedy at law available.[8] A mortgagee not in possession and having merely a lien may maintain an action to remove a cloud from such lien, even though the statute authorizes an action to quiet title or remove a cloud to be brought only by one in possession, there being no remedy at law.[9] For the same reason, where a vendee is in possession of the land under a contract of sale, but refuses to accept title because of an adverse claim by defendant, the vendor may maintain a bill to quiet title.[10] Where neither party has possession, there is no adequate remedy at law, and hence equity has jurisdiction.[11]

(2) Existence of Other Equitable Grounds for Relief

The rule requiring the plaintiff to have possession of property in order to sue to quiet title thereto is inapplicable where there is some other special ground for equitable jurisdiction.

The rule requiring plaintiff to be in possession does not apply where some other special ground for equitable jurisdiction is shown, or the primary relief sought is based on some distinct head of equity jurisdiction and the removal of a cloud and the quieting of title is sought only as an incident to that relief.[12] Hence equity will entertain a bill

Possession not of essence

Jurisdiction to grant equitable relief against a cloud on title is grounded in need for protection of complainant's title against injury or vexatious embarrassment that may flow from instrument or proceeding constituting the cloud, and possession is not of the essence of right to that relief.—Estate of Gilbert Smith v. Cohen, 196 A. 361, 123 N.J.Eq. 419.

Optionors who were not in possession could maintain a suit in equity to cancel an option as a cloud on title even if respondent's claim of title under alleged cloud was legal rather than equitable, where respondent was alleged to be a nonresident of the state not subject to suit in personam unless he made a voluntary appearance, since an action in ejectment against his tenant in possession, if any, would not bind him, and optionors had no adequate remedy at law.—McDonald v. Fraudulent effort to appropriate title

An action to quiet title may be maintained by one who is owner of realty but not in possession when an effort is made on the part of the defendant to seize and fraudulently appropriate the particular title under which the plaintiff claimed.—Spencer v. Steele, 175 S.W.2d 1005, 296 Ky. 3—Williams v. Thomas, 149 S.W.2d 525, 285 Ky. 776.

Void deeds

Subject matter of bill to adjudge void deeds whereby three devisees to have canceled as a cloud on title an instrument, the execution of which is shown by proper averments to have been procured by fraud, notwithstanding plaintiff is out of possession.[13] The cancellation of the instrument under which defendant claims must be the main relief sought, and must be based on an equitable ground other than the fact that it covers the land in controversy.[14] However, the alleged necessity for an accounting will not confer jurisdiction of an action to quiet title where plaintiff is not in possession.[15]

(3) Holders of Future Estates

Ordinarily the holder of a future estate, such as a remainderman, may bring suit to quiet his title even though not in possession of the property.

The general rule requiring plaintiff to be in possession at the time the action is commenced is subject to an exception in favor of the holder of a future estate, such as a remainderman or reversioner, who, pending the possession of the life tenant, can maintain an action to quiet his title,[16] unless the holder of the future estate has an adequate remedy at law, in which case he may not sue to quiet title without possession.[17]

On the other hand, it has been held that remaindermen out of possession cannot maintain such an action unless they show some special or exceptional occasion for invoking the aid of equity[18]

§ 28. —— When Title or Interest Equitable

A plaintiff out of possession may sue to quiet title where his title is equitable instead of legal, where such a title is sufficient to support the action.

Where plaintiff's title or interest is an equitable one, possession by him is not necessary to equitable jurisdiction.[19] This rule does not apply, however, where an equitable title is not sufficient to support the action,[20] nor is the rule applicable where an equitable title is sufficient to maintain a statutory action of right in a court of law.[21]

§ 29. —— Statutes Dispensing with Possession in General

Under statutory provisions expressly or impliedly dispensing with the necessity of possession, a plaintiff out of possession may maintain a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon when the facts bring the case within the purview of the statute.

Where statutes expressly or by necessary implication dispense with the necessity of possession by permitting a plaintiff out of possession to bring suit to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon, he may maintain the action in any case falling within the purview of such statutory provisions,[22] but not

Clear legal title

Under statute, a plaintiff who has clear legal title to real estate but who is out of possession may maintain a suit in equity to remove cloud on title to land.—Bennett v. Neff, 42 S.E.2d 793, 130 W.Va. 121.

Plaintiff in possession

where the facts take the case out of the statute,[23] or where such statute has been repealed.[24] It is generally held that plaintiff need not be in possession where the statute, omitting any reference to possession, authorizes the action to be brought by "any person" against another who claims an adverse estate or interest.[25] Where the statute dispenses with the necessity of possession by plaintiff, a landlord may sue to quiet title as against a hostile claim of one who has taken possession from the tenant, without awaiting the termination of the lease.[26] Under a statute conferring jurisdiction on the chancery court to hear and determine suits instituted by any person claiming legal or equitable title to lands, whether or not in possession, against any other person not in possession, plaintiff may not maintain the suit as against a defendant who is in actual possession of the land.[27] Under a statute permitting any person in possession to bring an action against another who claims an estate or interest therein adverse to him, and permitting such action to be joined with an action to recover possession by any person not in possession, a plaintiff must be in possession or must seek possession when he sues to quiet title[28] and it is not necessary that plaintiff first secure possession of the realty before suing to quiet title thereto.[29]

§ 30. —— Vacant or Unoccupied Lands, or Lands Not in Actual Possession of Defendant

Under some statutes a person may maintain a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon although not in possession of the land, where such property is vacant or unoccupied or where the land involved is not in the actual possession of the defendant.

Some statutes dispense with the necessity of possession by plaintiff where the land which forms the subject matter of the action is vacant or unoccupied,[30] while others permit an action by a per

In Mississippi

(1) Possession by complainant or nonoccupancy of land is not required as a condition precedent to right to maintain suit to remove cloud from title to land.—Broome v. Jackson, 7 So.2d 829, 193 Miss. 66, suggestion of error overruled 8 So.2d 245, 193 Miss. 66.

(2) Either possession in complainant or proof that land is unoccupied is indispensable to confirmation of title in complainant.—Broome v. Jackson, supra—51 C.J. p 187 note 71 [d].

(3) However, it has been broadly stated that the owner of land out of possession may resort to an equity court to remove clouds and confirm title.—Dockery v. Zerkowsky, 189 So. 797, 186 Miss. 31.

Remainder or reversion

The statute relating to an action to quiet title gives a right of action to one out of possession who claims an estate or interest in remainder or reversion in real property but it does not give such right to one out of possession who claims the entire estate.—Lake Front-East Fifty-Fifth Street Corp. v. Prior to the statutory amendment in 1943, Real Prop.L. § 500, which permits a person who claims an interest in real property to bring an action to determine adverse claims and which omits the requirement of possession, for the maintenance of an action to quiet title or determine adverse claims it was essential that plaintiff be in possession.—Harris v. Noque, 266 N.Y.S. 785, 240 App.Div. 728—Beidleman v. People, 39 N.Y.S.2d 333—51 C.J. p 186 note 42.

Ejectment or trespass

Grantor's heir, not being in possession of land which had been conveyed to railroad to be used solely for construction and maintenance of railroad, could not maintain bill in chancery to establish title to land by virtue of alleged reversion as against defendants in possession of the land under conveyance from grantee's successor after abandonment of the land for railroad purposes, since heir had an adequate remedy at law in ejectment or trespass.—Crawford v. Color of title; taxes

(1) The Grove Act extends the relief under suits to quiet title to cases where no one is in actual possession, if complainant or those under whom he claims has held color of title and has paid taxes for ten or more consecutive years preceding suit, and to cases where complainant or he and his privies in claim have paid taxes during the whole of such period, and no other person has paid taxes during any part of such period, regardless of status of actual possession.—Hixson v. Swift, 9 So.2d 891, 243 Ala. 289.

(2) Under such statute the state had sufficient constructive possession of land granted it by federal patent to support its suit to quiet title thereto, where respondents had no claim of title except by adverse possession, which was not sufficiently proved, or effective in law to show title superior to state's claim under patent, and no one was in actual possession of land, or scrambling son out of possession when the land is not in the actual possession of defendant.[31]

§ 31. —— Waiver of Objection

The objection that plaintiff in a suit to quiet title is not in possession may be waived by defendant, as where he seeks affirmative relief.

The objection that plaintiff in a suit to quiet title is not in possession may be waived.[32] Such waiver results where the objection is not taken by demurrer, plea, or answer,[33] or where, after demurrer on this ground is overruled, defendant answers on the merits.[34] Defendant likewise waives the objection where he stipulates for the trial of the cause before a master.[35]

Asking for affirmative relief. A defendant who by answer or cross bill seeks affirmative relief on matters clearly cognizable in equity thereby supplies any defect in jurisdiction arising from plaintiff's lack of possession and places the whole cause before the court,[36] as where defendant asserts his own title and seeks to have it quieted.[37] However, this rule does not apply where defendant sets up his own title and possession only by way of defense, and does not ask affirmative relief.[38]

§ 32. Sufficiency

a. In general
b. Lawfulness of possession
c. Possession subject to easement
d. Possession of vendee

a. In General

Ordinarily possession must be actual, as opposed to constructive, in order to support an action to quiet title, although the rule may vary under statutes.

Whenever possession is a condition precedent to the maintenance of the action, as discussed supra §§ 26–31, actual possession or possession in fact, as distinguished from constructive possession simply by virtue of legal title, is usually contemplated,[39] unless a statute makes constructive possession sufficient.[40] Hence the general rule is that one having to retain or secure possession thereof, when suit was brought.—Grissom v State for Use of Alabama College, 48 So.2d 197, 254 Ala. 218

Failure to put possession in issue

Court of equity has jurisdiction to quiet title though land is not actually in possession of complainant, where possession is alleged by bill and not put in issue by answer.—Campbell Stores v Mayor and Council of City of Hoboken, 169 A. 681, 115 N J Eq. 159.

the legal title, and in constructive possession only, cannot maintain the action,[41] although constructive possession will support a statutory action to determine adverse claims, where the plain intent of the statute, by merely using the word "possession," is to dispense with actual possession.[42]

What constitutes actual possession is a mixed question of law and fact,[43] depending on the character and location of the land, the situation of the parties, and other circumstances of the particular case.[44] Generally speaking, in order to constitute actual possession it is necessary only to put the land to such use, or exercise such dominion over it, as in its present state it is reasonably adapted to,[45] and it is not necessary that one should actually live on the land.[46] However, it has been held that there must be an open and visible occupancy,[47] and that the possession must be so open, visible, notorious, and exclusive as to be calculated in its very nature to inform persons in the vicinity, and those seeing the property, that some person has appropriated it and is using and occupying it as his own.[48]

Constructive possession sufficient to support an action to quiet title is that possession which the law annexes to the legal title or ownership of property,[49] and one having a legal estate in fee in the property has the constructive possession thereof unless there is actual possession in another.[50]

Cotenants. The possession of a tenant in common claiming adversely to plaintiff, a cotenant whose title is in part only denied, has been held not the possession of plaintiff,[51] but it has also been held that a tenant not in physical possession of land held in cotenancy may sue to quiet title and secure partition as against his cotenant.[52]

Necessity of exclusive possession. Plaintiff's possession and occupancy jointly with defendant is insufficient to enable him to maintain the action under a statute making the remedy available only to one "in possession."[53]

b. Lawfulness of Possession

The possession essential to maintain a suit to quiet title should be such as was acquired in a lawful manner.

The possession which gives jurisdiction in actions to quiet title, whenever possession is a jurisdictional fact, must be such as was acquired in a legal manner,[54] and hence possession wrongfully

(2) Where contract for sale of mining property provided that, as to payment due by purchasers, time was of the essence, and authorized vendor to declare forfeiture in case of purchasers' default, and vendor reentered on purchasers' default, vendor's possession on reentry was obtained,[55] whether by force[56] or fraud,[57] will not suffice, and this is also true of a possession illegally retained by a grantor after he has conveyed the fee.[58] In some jurisdictions, however, it has been held that, under a statute giving a right of action to a person in possession, a person having such possession may sue, irrespective of the mode by which he acquired it.[59]

Attempt to deprive plaintiff of possession Where plaintiff is in possession of property, claiming either under paper title or adverse possession, one who fences off such property becomes merely a trespasser and does not deprive plaintiff of possession so as to preclude him from maintaining a suit to quiet title.[60]

Possession taken in contemplation of suit. It has been held that possession taken for the purpose of instituting an action to quiet title is sufficient[61] if it was not tortious or in violation of the prior possession of another;[62] but that it is otherwise where possession taken for such purpose was obtained by force, fraud, or other wrongful means.[63] On the other hand, some authorities have held that a possession obtained peaceably, although by a trespass, and for the purpose of bringing suit, is sufficient.[64]

c. Possession Subject to Easement

The fact that the plaintiff's possession is subject to an easement will not preclude him from maintaining a suit to quiet title or to remove a cloud therefrom.

One in possession of land as the owner in fee, subject to the right of the public to use it as a public street or highway, has such possession of the premises as entitles him to maintain an action to remove a cloud from the title.[65] The mere use of a claimed easement by defendant will not oust plaintiff of his actual possession.[66]

d. Possession of Vendee

A vendee's possession is a sufficient possession of the vendor to support the latter's suit to quiet title.

The possession of a vendee, under a contract of sale, is a sufficient possession of the vendor to enable him to maintain a bill to quiet title,[67] at least as against a third person not claiming under the vendor.[68] Under statutes providing that an owner in possession through his tenant may maintain suit to quiet title, as discussed infra § 34, one having a contract for the sale of property, and put into possession thereof by the owner for the purpose of building, occupies a position so analogous to that of a tenant as to enable the owner to maintain an action to quiet title.[69]

§ 33. —— Vacant and Unoccupied Lands

In the case of wild or vacant lands, the possession essential to maintenance of a suit to quiet title may be constructive.

To the rule requiring actual possession to maintain an action to quiet title, discussed supra § 32 a, an exception is recognized in some jurisdictions, where the lands forming the subject matter of the action are vacant and unoccupied, in which case the constructive possession arising from legal ownership is regarded as sufficient to support the action,[70] and it has been said that constructive possession is suffi-not unlawful and was sufficient to entitle the vendor to maintain action to quiet title to the property.—Lowe v. Sory, 111 P.2d 1054, 107 Colo. 341.

cient where neither party is in actual possession.[71] If the land is not occupied by anyone, some authorities hold that a plaintiff having title may sue to quiet it either because the remedy exists independently of statute[72] or because his title affords him constructive possession sufficient to satisfy statutory provisions to the effect that one having "possession" is entitled to sue.[73] On the other hand, it has been held that where neither party has any actual possession, but each claims constructive possession by virtue of his paper title, equity has no jurisdiction, since the question to be determined is the ownership of the legal title, which must be tried in an action at law.[74]

§ 34. —— Possession of Agent or Tenant

Possession by the plaintiff's agent or tenant ordinarily is sufficient possession to support a suit to quiet title.

In some jurisdictions possession of land by plaintiff's agent is, by statute, sufficiently the possession of plaintiff to sustain an action to quiet title;[75] and, independently of statute, it has been held that possession of a duly authorized agent, having charge of the land and engaged in keeping off trespassers, is sufficient to sustain an action to quiet title in favor of the owner of the legal title who is himself a nonresident.[76] Plaintiff's possession is not interrupted by the presence of a third person on the land as his employee.[77]

Tenant. Possession of real property by a tenant is sufficient to enable the landlord to maintain an action to quiet title,[78] and this is so under statutes in some jurisdictions.[79] The fact that a tenant, without the knowledge or consent of his landlord, may have paid rent to a person claiming adversely does not take the case from the operation of the statute,[80] but such a statutory provision does not permit an action against a tenant claiming an estate adverse to the landlord.[81] On the other hand, it has been held that a director or manager of a corporation cannot acquire a hostile possession of its property so as to prevent it from maintaining an action under a statute authorizing the action to be brought by any person in possession by himself or his tenant.[82] The fact that one spouse occupies land as tenant of a plaintiff suing to quiet title does not prevent the other spouse from asserting a claim to such land.[83]

§ 35. —— Peaceable Possession

Under the provisions of some statutes the possession which will support a suit to quiet title must be peaceable.

Where the possession sufficient to support an action to quiet title is limited by statute to peaceable possession, plaintiff must, in a case falling within the purview of the statute, show that he has a peaceable, as distinguished from a disputed or scrambling, possession,[84] or from a possession acquired by force or threats,[85] although where the case does not fall within the purview of the statute such a showing may be unnecessary.[86] A "peaceable possession," within the contemplation of such statutes, has been variously defined as a possession so clear that no one denies the fact of the possession, whether actual or constructive;[87] any possession where a person, although setting up a claim of title, has not interfered with possession by any act suable at law by a suit which may or will involve his claim of title,[88] or a possession undisturbed by any act of a person in or upon the locus in quo, for which act such person would be suable in an action by which the title to the property could be determined.[89]

It has been held that plaintiff need only be in peaceable possession of the locus in quo as against defendant, without regard to the claims of third persons.[90] "Peaceable possession" refers to the character of the possession, and the fact that some person is denying plaintiff's right to possession does not create a disputed or scrambling possession;[91] but such person must do something indicating that he claims to be in possession himself.[92] Merely going upon the land, however, while it is in plaintiff's possession, claiming title thereto and warning plaintiff off, is not sufficient to affect plaintiff's peaceable possession,[93] nor will the fact that the adverse claimant is a tenant in common with plaintiff qualify the latter's peaceable possession under claim of title.[94]

The possession of defendant which will make plaintiff's possession a disputed one, and thus defeat his action, need not, however, be technically an adverse possession which would in time ripen into title,[95] and it has been held that defendant's claim of possession through attornment of plaintiff's tenant is sufficient to make plaintiff's possession a disputed one,[96] notwithstanding the general rule that a tenant may not attorn to a stranger.[97] In the final analysis, what constitutes a peaceable possession under the statute must be left for determination on the facts of each case.[98]

In accordance with some statutes, a person claiming ownership of wild, wood, waste, unenclosed, or unimproved lands who has paid taxes thereon which have been assessed to him or to his grantors for five consecutive years immediately preceding commencement of the suit shall be presumed to be in peaceable possession of the lands if no other person is in actual possession.[99] It is unnecessary that the taxes be paid during the year in which they were assessed[1] or that the taxes be assessed by lot and block number instead of in bulk.[2]

Actual or constructive peaceable possession. Under statutes providing that the peaceable possession may be either actual or constructive, it is as indispensable that a constructive possession be peaceable as that actual possession be so.[3] However, constructive possession, if peaceable, has been held sufficient whether or not the land is vacant.[4]

§ 36. —— Possession of Part of Tract

Actual possession of part of the land coupled with constructive possession of the balance may afford possession sufficient to support an action to quiet title.

Actual possession by plaintiff of part of a tract of land, coupled with constructive possession of the balance, where no one is in actual adverse possession of such balance, is a sufficient possession of the whole to sustain an action to quiet title,[5] at least where such balance constitutes but a small portion of the whole.[6] Otherwise stated, plaintiff's actual possession of the particular tract is sufficient possession of adjoining land held under the same title and used in connection therewith.[7] Where one in possession of a tract of land purchases an adjoining tract, he will be presumed to have extended his possession over the part so acquired, and may maintain a bill to quiet title thereto.[8] Where, however, one has a patent to all unappropriated lands within a certain boundary, possession of certain detached parcels of unappropriated land, separated from the land in dispute by land already appropriated, is not such possession as will extend over all lands unappropriated when the patent issued.[9]

F. ADVERSE CLAIM OR INTEREST OF DEFENDANT

§ 37. Necessity

In order to maintain the statutory action to determine adverse claims to realty, there must be a showing that defendant asserts a claim which is adverse to plaintiff's title or possession.

Every description of claim
(1) An "action to quiet title" embraces every sort of a claim whereby the plaintiff might be deprived of his property or his title clouded or its value depreciated, or whereby the plaintiff might be incommoded or damnified by assertion of an outstanding title already held or to grow out of the adverse pretension.—Castro v. Barry, 21 P. 946, 79 Cal. 443—Head v. Pordyce, 17 Cal. 149—Bank of America Nat. Trust & Savings Ass'n v. Town of Atherton, 140 P.2d 678, 60 Cal.App.2d 268—Hamilton v. Elvidge, 22 P.2d 239, 132 Cal. (2) Action to quiet title lies against claimant in respect of land, although claim is based on mere pretension or asserted right therein or thereto, or issues out of, or concerns, or is annexed to or exercisable in connection with such property.

(2) Where building restrictions imposed by municipal ordinance limited use, obstructed sale, and greatly depreciated value of property, action to quiet title was proper remedy to determine validity of ordinance.—Bank of America Nat. Trust & Savings Ass'n v. Town of Atherton, 140 P.2d 678, 60 Cal.App.2d 268.

(3) The filing of a map embodying state survey of highway evidenced claim on part of state that highway was of width and in location shown on map and was sufficient to give rise to an equitable right of action to determine a claim to real property. Heidheim v. People, 39 N.Y.S. 2d 333.

(4) A landowner was not precluded from maintaining action to quiet title to land on ground that affidavit in which defendant claimed a life interest in land did not constitute a cloud on title because affidavit was not acknowledged, where statutory action to quiet title was not limited to removal of mere clouds on title but embraced any claim of interest in the land adverse to plaintiff and defendant pleaded and undertook to prove a claim of interest in land adverse to plaintiff. Corman v. Cree, C.C.A.N.M., 100 F.2d 486.

(2) Contract to purchase oil was not "adverse claim" affecting real estate.—Bartholomae Oil Corporation v. Delaney, 286 P. 690, 112 Cal App. 314.

(3) Where lessors had reentered into possession of leased premises on lessee's breaches of terms of lease and no one was disputing lessors' right to possession or asserting claims against anything but leasehold estate, lessors were held not entitled to equitable decree removing alleged clouds on their fee-simple title, since title was in state of tranquility.—Hill v. 1550 Hinman claims under a recorded instrument or merely asserts an unknown but hostile claim,[12] and whether or not it constitutes a technical cloud on title.[13] Under this rule relief may be had against instruments which are void on their face,[14] and which do not, therefore, constitute clouds on title within the principles of equity, as discussed supra § 13. The adverse claim or interest contemplated under some statutes must be in the legal sense the assertion of an adverse claim or interest in the property,[15] but, where the statute has dispensed with the necessity of possession by plaintiff, an action to quiet title will lie by a landlord against his tenant in possession for the purpose of determining the validity of an adverse claim set up by the tenant,[16] even though such claim is no more than the right of possession as tenant.[17]

A grantor, after conveying the legal title, cannot maintain an action with respect thereto under the statute, since the title is in privity and not adverse.[18]

§ 39. —— Present or Future Interest

The assertion of a future or contingent interest or right in the property may constitute an adverse claim.

A claim may be adverse, although defendant is not asserting a present right to recover possession;[19] an assertion of a future or contingent interest is sufficient.[20] Accordingly, a person claiming an estate in fee may maintain an action against one wrongfully claiming an estate in reversion or remainder,[21] and a devisee in whom a contingent remainder is vested may maintain an action against other contingent remaindermen to quiet title, although the life estate is not terminated.[22] However, one claiming only a life estate cannot maintain an action to determine adverse claims to the remainder, because such claims are not adverse to him.[23]

§ 40. —— Lien Claims

Whether an action will be against lien claimants under a statute depends on the phraseology of such statute and the construction given thereto by the courts.

Whether an action will lie against lien claimants under the statute depends upon the phraseology of such statute and the construction given thereto by the courts.[24] Where the statute provides broadly for the determination of adverse claims to land, it has been held applicable to lien claims.[25] Likewise, it has been held that lien claims are within a statute authorizing an action to be maintained against a person "claiming title," and providing that the petition shall pray that defendant be barred from claiming "any right" adverse to plaintiff.[26] In some jurisdictions it has been held that a lien is not within the purview of a statute providing for the determination of an adverse "estate or interest" in land;[27] but in other jurisdictions the word "interest" has been held broad enough to include liens.[28]

G. DEFENSES

§ 41. General Statement

In an action to quiet title, all defenses, equitable, as well as legal, may be invoked.

In an action to quiet title, all defenses,[29] equitable, as well as legal,[30] may be invoked. Accordingly, a prospective,[31] as well as a present[32] claim in the property, may be asserted as a defense to the action.

Estoppel. The defense by way of equitable estoppel is available in an action to quiet title.[33]

Where a use-plaintiff sues to quiet title, defendant may avail himself of any defense he may have had against the nominal plaintiff at the date of the transfer from the nominal to the use-plaintiff.[34] The nominal plaintiff cannot end the litigation by a deed to defendant after transfer of title to the use-plaintiff,[35] but, where defendant's deed was given prior to the deed to the use-plaintiff, defendant may prove it as a defense against the use-plaintiff.[36]

§ 42. Particular Defenses

a. In general
b. Want of title in plaintiff
c. Title in third person
d. Existing agreement by plaintiff to dispose of interest in lands

a. In General

Various matters have been held to constitute, or not to constitute, a good defense to an action to quiet title.

Equity will not encourage speculation in doubtful and disputed titles, and the fact that plaintiff purchased such a title with knowledge of its doubtful character is a good defense.[37] On the other hand, the fact that a codefendant, joined as a tenant in common, was not a bona fide purchaser, but purchased his interest in collusion with plaintiff and in the latter's interest, is no defense where the rights of the other defendant were not prejudiced.[38] So the fact that defendant, claiming under a sheriff's deed, void because there was no valid publication of notice in the proceedings under which the property was attached and sold, might be allowed to amend the proof of service and have a new valid judgment for the enforcement of the attachment lien, is no ground for denying relief to plaintiff.[39]

Also relief will not be denied the owner of a fee because of the voluntary payment of taxes by another,[40] without claim of title and under a mistaken assessment.[41] In an action by a grantee against the grantor to quiet title, the grantor may, without reentry, defend on the ground that the grantee has failed to perform a condition subsequent;[42] but such defense is not available to one holding an option to purchase from the grantor.[43] Various other facts pleaded by defendant have been held to constitute[44] or not to constitute[45] a good defense to an action to quiet title.

Partial defenses. Defendant cannot wholly defeat plaintiff's action by showing that plaintiff is estopped as a tenant to dispute title and right of possession to a part only of the realty in controversy, plaintiff being entitled, in such case, to a decree to quiet title to that portion of the property to which the estoppel does not apply.[46]

b. Want of Title in Plaintiff

Where plaintiff is not in possession of the property, a defendant in an action to quiet title may effectually resist a decree against himself by showing simply that the plaintiff is without title. However, where the plaintiff makes a prima facie showing of title, defendant cannot question plaintiff's title where he shows no title or interest in himself.

Where plaintiff is not in possession of the property,[47] a defendant in an action to quiet title may effectually resist a decree against himself by showing simply that the plaintiff is without title,[48] since if the plaintiff has no title he cannot complain that someone else, also without title, asserts an interest in the land.[49] However, where the plaintiff makes a prima facie showing of title,[50] even if that title is by possession only,[51] defendant cannot question plaintiff's title where he shows no title or interest in himself,[52] or where both parties derive their

(1) Where, after alleged repudiation of oil lease by lessor, the lessee did nothing and failed to pay the rent or do drilling as required by lease, lessee was in no position to take advantage of alleged breach by lessor in lessor's action to quiet title for failure to pay rentals and to do drilling required by lease.—Rehart v. Klossner, 119 P.2d 148, 48 Cal. App.2d 46.

(2) Where suit to quiet title to land taken in satisfaction of trust deed was defended on ground of payment of debt before giving of trust deed for benefit of defendant's brother, action could not be defeated on ground that defendant had been deceived by his brother where plaintiff was not a party to such deception.—Simon Newman Co. v. Tully, 88 P.2d 131, 13 Cal.2d 134.

(3) Defendants, not proving valid assignment to their decedent from purchaser of land, could not urge, in vendor's action to quiet title, vendor's noncompliance with covenants of sale contract.—Los Angeles First Nat. Trust & Savings Bank v. Northrup, 8 P.2d 528, 120 Cal.App. 677.

(4) Plaintiff was not estopped to bring suit to quiet title under deed from his mother, now deceased, because defendant, who was plaintiff's stepfather, had prior to commencement of suit made material improvements to the property, even if such improvements had been made without defendant's knowledge that plaintiff claimed title to premises.—Wilder v. Conlon, 30 N.W.2d 764, 239 Iowa 187.

(5) Where plaintiff, through persuasion of persons plaintiff was entitled to believe would not act inconsistent with plaintiff's welfare, entered into improvident contract, which among other things entitled defendant as tenant to continue in possession of plaintiff's premises for an indefinite period, acceptance of rent from defendant was not a ratification of contract precluding quieting title to premises against claims under contract.—Peck v. Williams, 79 N.E.2d 562, 82 Ohio App. 35.

Where it is shown in action to quiet title that plaintiff is in actual possession of realty in controversy, defendant cannot defeat plaintiff's action except by showing a paramount right in himself.—Federal Savings & Loan Ins. Corporation v. Hatton, 135 P.2d 559, 156 Kan. 673.

52. Colo.—Bennett v. Morrison, 242 P. 636, 78 Colo. 464.
51 C.J. p 197 note 78.

Strangers or intruders

In action to quiet title, want of validity of plaintiff's title may not be challenged by strangers and intruders, that is, persons who were neither in possession of the property nor connected in any way with the paramount source of title.—Pacific States Savings & Loan Co. v. Warden, 117 P.2d 877, 18 Cal.2d 757.

title from a common source.[53] Accordingly, where plaintiff establishes a prima facie title in himself under a mortgage foreclosure sale, defendant, who was a stranger to the mortgagor and his title, could not attack the validity of the foreclosure;[54] nor can defendant, in an action to set aside a judgment against plaintiff's grantor and conveyances based thereon, as clouds on title, assert fraud by such grantor in procuring his title from the government.[55]

The fact that plaintiff procured his title by fraud on his grantors cannot avail defendant, a stranger to the transaction, whose conduct was not influenced thereby and who makes no claim under or through the persons defrauded.[56] Likewise, where plaintiff holds the legal title, his right to maintain the action cannot be attacked by defendants, who are without title, on the ground that he holds his title as trustee[57] or that the conveyance to him was champertous.[58] It has also been held that one defendant cannot attack the sufficiency of plaintiff's title as against a codefendant.[59] Other cases where defendant was held to be precluded from attacking plaintiff's title or right of possession are collected in the note.[60]

c. Title in Third Person

Where plaintiff is in the actual possession of the land in controversy, defendant cannot defeat the action by showing an outstanding paramount right or title in a third person.

Where plaintiff is in the actual possession of the land in controversy, defendant cannot defeat the action by showing an outstanding paramount right or title in a third person,[61] at least where such outstanding title is not a valid and subsisting one.[62] Likewise, it has been held that the holder of a naked legal title to land, as against a plaintiff in possession thereof, will not be permitted to set up a countervailing equity in a third person, with whom he is not in privity, and who, being also a party defendant to the action, by his default confesses plaintiff's title.[63] The fact that a third person has obtained title to the land by adverse possession does not militate against the rights of the plaintiff in the absence of a showing of privity between such third person and defendant.[64] However, a defendant in adverse possession may defeat the action by showing a title outstanding in a third person,[65] without connecting himself with that title,[66] although as to this, there appears to be authority to the contrary.[67]

d. Existing Agreement by Plaintiff to Dispose of Interest in Lands

The right of plaintiff cannot be defeated by showing that he has entered into an agreement to dispose of the property, where such agreement in no way affects plaintiff's title.

The right of plaintiff cannot be defeated by showing that he has entered into an agreement to dispose of the property, where such agreement in no way affects plaintiff's title.[68] Accordingly, a contract[69] of sale[70] which is not specifically enforceable cannot be the basis of a defense by one claiming an interest in the property under such contract. Likewise, a vendor's failure to carry out a contract to convey is no defense to an action by him against the purchaser to remove a cloud from title, where the latter subsequently agreed to waive his rights under the contract.[71] However, where plaintiff contracts to sell land to defendant, the contract entitling defendant to possession, and subsequently contracts to sell the land to another person, defendant's contract is, in the absence of the second vendee as a party, a complete defense to an action to quiet title.[72] So a vendor is not entitled to a decree quieting title, where it involves enforcing a forfeiture of the contract of sale under which he has received part payment, as against assignees of the contract who have paid a large advance in price and are able and willing to pay the balance, but have made default in payment of the installment on which forfeiture is claimed, in reliance on representations of plaintiff's agent that plaintiff would later accept payment and execute a deed.[73]

§ 43. —— Title or Interest of Defendant

The right of the plaintiff to recover in an action to quiet title may be defeated by defendant showing a paramount title in himself or any valid interest in the land.

Plaintiff's right to recover may be defeated by defendant showing a paramount title in himself,[74] but not if defendant acquired his title subsequent to the commencement of the action,[75] although it has been held that, where defendant, being unable to show sufficient title because he could not by competent evidence trace his title from the original patentee into one of his earlier grantors, procured a deed from the patentee's heir pending the action, defendant's title, if otherwise valid, will prevail.[76] Likewise, a plaintiff in a suit to quiet title cannot obtain a decree if the defendant has any valid interest in the land.[77] Accordingly, it is a good defense that defendant is a tenant of plaintiff under a valid lease, and that a decree quieting title would cut off the tenant's interest under the lease.[78] However, it has been held that defendant's ownership of stock in a corporation does not give him an interest in the corporation's real property, which he can set up in an action to quiet title.[79]

Title by adverse possession is a good defense where the elements necessary to constitute such adverse possession are established.[80]

Failure to pay taxes. Failure of plaintiff's ancestors to pay taxes on the land for several years is no defense, where there has been no sale to enforce a forfeiture for nonpayment.[81] Likewise, failure of plaintiff, claiming title by adverse possession, to pay taxes on every part of disputed property for some of many years of continuous possession relied on, does not warrant judgment for defendant, claiming under void tax deed.[82]

§ 44. —— Defendant in Possession

Unless the statutes dispense with the necessity of possession by the plaintiff, possession by defendant will defeat an action to quiet title brought by the holder of the legal title.

Unless the statutes dispense with the necessity of possession by plaintiff, possession by defendant will defeat an action to quiet title brought by the holder of the legal title,[83] since, as considered supra § 27, where the defendant is in possession, the remedy at law by action in ejectment ordinarily affords a plain, adequate, and complete remedy. or committed unlawful acts in taking possession,[85] has been held not to change the rule. On the other hand, it has been held that possession taken from plaintiff by force will not give defendant such possession as will enable him to defeat plaintiff's action,[86] and this has been held true of a possession acquired by collusion with plaintiff's tenant.[87] Moreover, defendant's possession, in order to constitute a defense, must be of such open, visible character as to give notice thereof.[88]

In determining whether defendant's possession is sufficient to constitute a defense, the character and situation of the land must be considered.[89] Where defendant, holding the legal title under a claim of ownership, inclosed land, previously uninclosed by anyone, with his other land, without force or fraud, his possession is sufficient.[90] However, placing signs on vacant land advertising it for sale has been held insufficient.[91] Possession by defendant's tenant is sufficient.[92]

Where plaintiff shows no title in himself, defendant's possession, irrespective of his title, is a good defense.[93] Actual possession of only part of the land described in a deed to defendant gives him constructive possession of the whole, even though the grantor had neither title nor possession.[94]

Unless otherwise provided, the usual rules of procedure governing civil actions are applicable to actions brought under a statute providing for the determination of adverse claims.[99] A court of equity must, however, view the case in the broadest aspects of the equitable rights of the parties, rather than on narrow and technical legal grounds.[1]

Jurisdiction of particular courts. The question as to what particular court has jurisdiction of an action to quiet title must be determined by reference to the constitutions and statutes of the different states.[6] Jurisdiction of courts of equity as to suits to quiet title has been considered in connection with the nature of the remedy discussed supra § 1.

b. Venue

Under constitutional or statutory provisions relating specifically to actions to quiet title or generally to actions affecting real property, an action to quiet title is local in its nature, and the venue is determined by the location of the property, and not the residence of the party.

Under constitutional or statutory provisions relating specifically to actions to quiet title or generally to actions affecting real property, an action to quiet title is local in its nature, and the venue is determined by the location of the property,[7] and not by the residence of the party,[8] and must, therefore, be brought in the county in which the land[9] or a part thereof[10] is situated. If brought in a county other than that in which the land lies, the court has no jurisdiction whatever,[11] even to change the venue;[12] and the objection, being jurisdictional, cannot be waived.[13] The objection may be taken by demurrer for want of jurisdiction[14] or by plea in abatement.[15]

On the other hand, it has been held that a suit to cancel a claim on land as a cloud on the title, where the property is in possession of the complainant and the court is not asked to make any disposition thereof, should not be held to be a proceeding purely in rem in the sense that a court would be wholly without jurisdiction in a county other than where the land is situated.[16]

§ 48. Time to Sue and Limitations

An action to quiet title must not be brought prematurely. Limitations may be invoked as a defense to the action except where plaintiff is in actual possession of the land and claims to be the owner thereof.

§ 49. Laches

a In general
b What constitutes

a. In General

Laches ordinarily is available as a defense to an action to quiet title, except where the action is a statutory one in which no equitable relief is sought by either party, or where the plaintiff is in possession under claim of title, or where the action is brought by the owner of wild, unoccupied, and unimproved land.

In accordance with the general rules, discussed in Equity §§ 112–132, laches ordinarily is available as a defense to an action to quiet title,[20] except where the action is a statutory one in which no equitable relief is sought by either party.[21] However, where plaintiff is in possession under claim of title, he is entitled to wait until his possession is invaded or his title attacked before taking steps to vindicate his right, and mere lapse of time will not bar an action by him to quiet title.[22] Likewise, laches ordinarily will not bar an action to quiet title based on a forged deed or forged alteration thereof.[23] Where defendant is not in possession, plaintiff's delay in bringing an action to quiet title will not preclude recovery, even though defendant has paid taxes on the land;[24] but it has been held that constructive possession of defendant is sufficient to enable him to invoke the doctrine of laches.[25] It has also been held that laches is no defense where plaintiff is vested with legal title to the land[26] or claims title by adverse possession.[27]

Wild and unoccupied land. The doctrine of laches has been held inapplicable in an action by the owner of wild, unoccupied, and unimproved land.[28] Such lands, as discussed supra § 33, are in the constructive possession of the owner, who need not assert his rights until there have been some affirmative acts invading them.[29] Mere inaction on the part of the owner, and failure to pay taxes for a time short of the statutory period, do not constitute supervening equities calling for the application of the doctrine of laches.[30] Likewise payment of taxes by another,[31] without color of title,[32] however long continued, alone will not constitute such an invasion of the owner's rights as to call for action on his part. Where defendant's predecessor did not establish title by adverse possession, and for many years before suit there was no regular occupancy by defendant or his predecessor, the owner of the land was not bound to commence an action to quiet title against occasional occupants, and his delay did not bar a subsequent suit.[33]

b. What Constitutes

The question whether or not there has been laches depends on the circumstances of the particular case, and mere lapse of time will not bar the action unless the circumstances are such as to render its maintenance inequitable.

The question whether or not there has been laches depends on the circumstances of the particular case,[34] and mere lapse of time will not bar the action unless the circumstances are such as to render its maintenance inequitable.[35] Unexcused delay for an unreasonable period of time, accompanied by other circumstances, may constitute a bar.[36] Hence, in determining the question of laches, the court will consider, in connection with the duration of the delay, its effect to mislead defendant to his injury,[37] as where expenditures have been made by him and risks incurred in reliance on his own right,[38] even though the rents received exceed the expenditures;[39] any change in conditions rendering the enforcement of plaintiff's right inequitable,[40] as where rights

B. PROCESS, AND INCIDENTAL RELIEF PENDING PROCEEDINGS

§ 50. Process

a. In general
b. Unknown persons

a. In General

The process or notice and service thereof in actions to quiet title or remove clouds thereon are, in the main, governed by statutes relating specifically to such actions, or statutes regulating process in civil actions generally.

The process or notice and service thereof in actions to quiet title or remove clouds thereon are, in the main, governed by statutes relating specifically to such actions, or statutes regulating process in civil actions generally.[47] The action is not an action in personam in which personal service is necessary;[48] and the jurisdiction of defendant, so far as to enable the court to determine the extent of his title to the land, may be acquired by any reasonable method of imparting notice provided by statute.[49] Thus, service by copy of the bill and notice out of the state is sufficient to confer jurisdiction to render a judgment in rem quieting the title or removing the cloud.[50] Accordingly, it is generally held that service by publication, under the authority of state statutes, is sufficient to confer jurisdiction as against nonresidents or others who cannot be personally served,[51] and the validity of such statutes has been sustained, not only by the courts of the states wherein they were enacted,[52] but also by the federal courts.[53] Likewise, under statutes authorizing service of process by publication, such service has generally been held valid and sufficient in actions to remove cloud on title[54] or to quiet title[55] to personal property, subject to the jurisdiction of the court.

Statutory requirements in relation to the mode of publication of service are mandatory,[56] and must be strictly followed;[57] and service by publication, based on an affidavit which does not comply with the statute, is insufficient to confer jurisdiction.[58]

Serving defendant under fictitious name. Where the statute provides that defendant may be served with summons under a fictitious name when his true name is unknown, a defendant so served cannot have the service set aside on the ground that plaintiff could have ascertained defendant's real name had he exercised reasonable diligence in examining the public records.[59] summons is served by publication against him, the court acquires no jurisdiction.[60]

b. Unknown Persons

Statutes permitting service of process in actions to quiet title by publication against unknown owners, claimants, or heirs must be strictly construed and followed.

In some jurisdictions the statutes permit service of process in actions to quiet title by publication against unknown owners, claimants, or heirs,[61] and whether such persons are residents or nonresidents is immaterial.[62] These statutes have been held invalid in some jurisdictions,[63] but in most jurisdictions their validity has been sustained.[64] However, the statutes must be strictly construed and followed,[65] and service by publication is not authorized where plaintiff has knowledge, or the means of acquiring knowledge, of the names of owners or claimants alleged to be unknown.[66] Where a statute which provides for quieting title by making the land a party defendant is complied with, and service had as required by the general law as to service by publication, it is not necessary to comply with the statute relating to service on unknown heirs.[67]

§ 51. Injunction, Receiver, and Use or Disposition of Property pending Proceedings

In a suit to quiet title, the court may, in its discretion, grant a temporary injunction to maintain the status quo, or appoint a receiver for the preservation of the property pending the action.

Where it is necessary to maintain the status quo pending an action to quiet title, a temporary injunction may be granted,[68] in the absence of an adequate remedy at law.[69] The granting of injunctive relief rests in the sound discretion of the court,[70] and in order to authorize such relief it is not necessary that a case shall be made out that will entitle plaintiff to relief at all events, but it is enough that the court finds, on the pleadings and evidence, a case which makes the transaction a proper subject for investigation in a court of equity.[71] However, where the filing of a bill to remove a cloud or to quiet title operates as a lis pendens, as discussed in Lis Pendens § 16, if no facts are stated tending to show that plaintiff will suffer any injury that might not be fully provided against by the filing of the notice of lis pendens, plaintiff is not entitled to a temporary injunction,[72] and, in such case, a complainant is not entitled to an injunction restraining defendant from transferring the land pendente lite.[73] Where an answer is filed setting up paramount title in defendant, an injunction previously issued on the complaint, restraining defendants from selling the property, is properly dissolved, since the validity of defendant's title should be judicially determined before enjoining its assertion.[74] Likewise, where all the equities are fully and inevasively denied by duly verified answer, and neither side is supported by evidence outside the pleadings, a preliminary injunction ought not to stand.[75]

A receiver may be appointed pending the action on a proper showing that such appointment is necessary for the preservation of the property.[76] However, it has been held that, where plaintiff is not in possession, the court is without power to appoint a receiver on his application, and require an adverse claimant, subsequently made a party, to deliver to the receiver all the papers and documents relating to the title.[77] Likewise, a receiver will not be appointed at the instance of a defendant in actual possession of the property to protect it from being interfered with by plaintiff, who is living thereon with defendant's permission.[78]

Impounding rents. Where a bill to remove a cloud on title avers that complainants are owners in fee and are in possession and entitled to the rents, defendants are not injured by an order impounding the rents with the clerk of the court until final disposition of the cause.[79] Such order is not equivalent to the appointment of a receiver, so as to require complainant to give bond.[80]

Infant children
In an action for the construction of a will and to remove a cloud on the title of lands, brought by the grantee of a deceased devisee, wherein defendants alleged that plaintiff claims under a fraudulent conveyance executed by the devisee, the infant children of such deceased devisee are proper parties defendant, since they must succeed to the title or interest of their father in the property conveyed, if the deed should be set aside.—Mellen v. Banning, 18 N.Y.S. 587, 61 Hun 627, 41 N.Y.St. 573.
Unborn children
In an action to quiet title where title was vested in one subject to be divested by the birth of children, it was held that, although the possibility of the party ever having children was remote, the title could not be perfected because there was no one who could be brought into court who represented the class of unborn children.—Barnett v. interest in the controversy, or whose interests will not necessarily be affected by the judgment or decree, are not necessary parties[84] Only the adverse claimants against whose claims it is sought to quiet title need be made parties,[85] and a mortgagee of defendant is not a necessary party where defendant is asserting an unfounded claim to the title.[86] A statute authorizing plaintiff to include as defendants, in addition to such persons as appear of record, all other persons known by him to have some adverse claim, does not require plaintiff to examine the public records and name as defendants all persons having an interest in the land.[87]

Heirs, devisees, and personal representatives. In an action to quiet title against the heirs of a decedent, the administrator is not a necessary party.[88] However, the executors of a defendant who died pending a suit to quiet title are necessary parties, where the will purported to give them a power of sale.[89] Likewise, in a suit to quiet title to homestead land between the devisees of a deceased husband and the heirs of the widow, the widow's administrator is not a necessary party.[90] So, also, it has been held that a foreign executor is not a necessary party plaintiff in an action by devisees to quiet title to local land.[91] Where both parties claim under a will which devised the property to testator's wife "and her heirs," all the children of the devisee should be made parties defendant, and the whole controversy settled in one suit.[92] A grantor's heirs who received advancements which precluded them from participating in a division of the grantor's land are necessary parties to a suit by other heirs to cancel deeds conveying land to certain of the grantor's children.[93] So, too, a statute which provides that, in suits against a decedent's estate involving the title to real estate, the executor or administrator, if any, and the heirs, shall be made parties, makes the heirs necessary parties in a suit against an estate to quiet title.[94]

In a suit by a grantee to remove a cloud on his title cast by the conditions of his deed, the grantor's heirs are necessary parties defendant, in the absence of a personal representative of the deceased grantor.[95]

b. Persons Who Have Parted with Interest

Generally, one who has parted with all his interest in the land in controversy is not a necessary party defendant.

Generally, one who has parted with all his interest in the land in controversy is not a necessary party defendant.[96] On the other hand, it has been held that, while this is true as to grantors in deeds with-

United States
In suit to remove clouds from title to land which parish had expropriated and by material act had transferred interest therein to the United States, the United States was not a "necessary party," although the suit involved construction of the notarial act for purpose of determining whether it granted a servitude to the United States or transferred full ownership, where defendants did not claim by or through the United States.—Parish of Jefferson v. out warranty,[97] a grantor who has conveyed by deed containing covenants of general warranty is a necessary party to an action to set aside the deed as a cloud on title,[98] although there is authority to the contrary.[99] It has also been held that, where the cloud sought to be removed consists of an alleged fraudulent conveyance, the persons executing such conveyance, against whom fraud is charged, are necessary and indispensable parties.[1]

Common grantors or their heirs. The grantor under whom both parties to the action claim is not a necessary party defendant.[2] Likewise, the heirs of the common grantor are not necessary parties defendant.[3] Accordingly, in a suit by a vendee under a contract of sale, against a subsequent grantee who had notice of plaintiff's prior equitable claim to have defendant's title divested, such subsequent grantee is the only necessary defendant.[4]

§ 54. —— Proper Parties

a. In general
b. Persons who have parted with interest, and their heirs

a. In General

All persons interested in the controversy are proper parties to a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon, although they may not be necessary or indispensable parties.

All persons interested in the controversy are proper parties to a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon,[5] although they may not be necessary or indispensable parties.[6] If not joined, their interests will not be affected, although the judgment or decree will be good as to the parties before the court.[7] However, persons who have no material subsisting interest in the realty involved, or in the object sought by the suit, are not proper parties.[8] All encumbrancers whose claims arose before the commencement of the suit are proper parties,[9] but purchasers pendente lite cannot be made parties without plaintiff's consent.[10] In some jurisdictions under statutes relating to suits to quiet title, the test as to whether one shall be made a party does not turn on the question whether he "has" asserted any title or interest in the premises, but whether he "might" do so.[11]

Heirs and personal representatives in action against estate. In an action against the estate of a decedent, both the heirs at law[12] and the personal representative, where he is entitled to possession of the realty,[13] are proper parties defendant. However, as discussed in Executors and Administrators § 103, ordinarily the executor or administrator has no interest in the realty, and is not a proper party to the action.[14]

Where contingent liability is negligible

In suit to cancel, as clouds on plaintiff's title, deed to same property executed by his grantor to third person and deed by such person to defendant, contingent liability of plaintiff's grantor as warrantor of title to third person did not make her an "indispensable party," where her liability was negligible, since consideration of deed was merely love and affection plus one dollar.—Chance v. Where not prejudicially affected

In suit to cancel, as clouds on plaintiff's title, deed to same property executed by plaintiff's grantor to third person and deed executed by such person to defendant, plaintiff's grantor was not an "indispensable party" to suit, since she would not be prejudicially affected by outcome of suit.—Chance v. Buxton, supra.

b. Persons Who Have Parted with Interest, and Their Heirs

Persons who have parted with their interest in the property, and likewise their heirs, are proper parties defendant, especially where such a grantor has conveyed by deed containing covenants of warranty.

Persons who have parted with their interest in the property,[15] and likewise their heirs,[16] are proper parties defendant, especially where such a grantor has conveyed by deed containing covenants of warranty.[17] So, too, a vendor is a proper party in a suit by the vendee to remove a cloud on title where such vendor has an equitable lien for a part of the purchase money unpaid,[18] or has made a contract with defendant constituting the cloud sought to be removed.[19] On the other hand, it has been held that a former owner of the land who claims no interest therein is not a proper party.[20]

§ 55. Plaintiffs

a. In general
b. Joinder

a. In General

An action to quiet title should be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest.

An action to quiet title not only may,[21] but must,[22] be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and one who has conveyed the land prior to the commencement of the action cannot sue in his own name for the use and benefit of the grantee.[23] On the other hand, it has been held that one who has conveyed away all of the land, warranting title,[24] or has conveyed away a portion of the land, retaining a portion,[25] may maintain an action to quiet title in his own name, without making the grantees coparties. Likewise, it has been held that a grantee may maintain the action either in his own name, or in the name of his grantor for his own use and benefit.[26] The right of a trustee of an express trust under the statutes to maintain an action in his own name without joining the cestui que trust, constituting an exception to the rule that a civil action must be brought in the name of the real party in interest, as discussed in Parties § 11, applies to an action to quiet title.[27] Under a statute providing that on a transfer by plaintiff of his interest the action may be continued in the name of the original party, where the land involved in an action to quiet title is transferred by plaintiff pending the action, such action is properly allowed to be continued in the name of the transferee;[28] and under the chancery practice a suit to quiet title cannot proceed until the person to whom plaintiff's interest passed pending the suit is substituted as plaintiff.[29] Likewise if, pending the action, plaintiff assigns the cause of action, the action is properly allowed to be continued with the assignee as a coplaintiff.[30] Where a statute provides that on the death of a sole plaintiff, if the cause of action survives, the court must allow or compel the action to be continued against his representative or successor in interest, on the death of plaintiff pending an action to determine adverse claims his devisee can be compelled to proceed with the action in his place.[31]

One suing for many. Where the question involved is one of common or general interest to many persons, or where the parties are numerous and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue for the benefit of all.[32]

Capacity to sue. An action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon may be maintained by a private corporation[33] or a municipality.[34] A nonresident of the state may likewise sue,[35] subject to the power of the court to impose terms.[36]

b. Joinder

All persons whose interests are in harmony, and only those, should be joined as parties plaintiff.

All persons whose interests are in harmony, and only those, should be joined as parties plaintiff.[37] Holders in severalty of distinct parcels of land under a common source of title may join as complainants in a bill to quiet title as against an adverse claim equally affecting the lands of all.[38] However, the rule has been held inapplicable where some of the plaintiffs claim under separate and distinct contracts to which all of their coplaintiffs are strangers.[39] In an action by the record owner of realty, failure to join, as plaintiffs, persons having equitable interests, other than ownership, in the property, is not ground for nonsuit, where such persons participate in the action, through plaintiff, the real party in interest, to an extent that the decree will bind them equally with the parties to the action.[40]

Tenants in common and joint tenants. One of several tenants in common to realty may maintain an action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon without joining his cotenants as coplaintiffs.[41] However, such cotenants may join.[42] Likewise, it has been held that joint tenants may join in an action to quiet their joint title.[43]

Husband and wife. Husband and wife may join as plaintiffs, it has been held, if the land is owned solely by the wife, and evidence of such ownership will not vitiate a finding for plaintiffs jointly;[44] but the rule is otherwise if the legal title to the land is in the husband solely.[45] A husband and wife, claiming to own different tracts of land separately, cannot join as plaintiffs in an action to quiet title of all the tracts.[46] However, it has been held that a wife who joined in signing notes, and a mortgage on her husband's land securing them, although she may have done so only to relinquish her marital rights, may properly be joined as plaintiff in an action by the husband to cancel such instruments as cloud on the title.[47]

Heirs and personal representatives. Where one dies intestate, leaving no debts, and there is no administration on his estate, all the heirs of such decedent may jointly maintain an action to cancel a deed of their ancestor, on the ground that it is illegal and void, and is a cloud on their title.[48] In some jurisdictions the statutes regulate the question of joinder in actions involving title to realty of a decedent.[49]

§ 56. Defendants

In order to obtain a complete adjudication, all persons having or claiming an interest in the land adversely to plaintiff may be joined as defendants.

Where appellants and brother each owned an undivided one-third interest in one tract of land and brother owned title to two additional tracts and they joined in complaint praying for decree confirming their title to an undivided one-third interest each in the one tract, and brother also sought decree confirming his title in the other two tracts, appellants were entitled to have their title quieted in them, and dismissal of petition because of misjoinder was error.—Ex parte Ripley, 193 S.W.2d 127, 209 Ark. 701.

In order to obtain a complete adjudication, all persons having or claiming an interest in the land adversely to plaintiff may be joined as defendants,[50] even though there is no privity or connection between them.[51] Accordingly, there is no misjoinder where each defendant claims a separate parcel of the land[52] from a different source or by an independent title,[53] although in some cases stress has been laid on the fact that all the defendants claimed title from a common source.[54] On the other hand, the rule has been laid down that defendants who do not in every instance claim interests adverse to plaintiffs in the same tract of land cannot be joined in an action to quiet title to all of the tracts.[55]

Unknown persons. In some jurisdictions the statutes provide for an action to determine adverse claims to realty in which all unknown persons may be joined.[56]

Capacity to be sued. The right to maintain an action against a municipal corporation to quiet title has been recognized.[57]

Legal and equitable owners. The holder of the legal title, although without any beneficial interest, may be joined as codefendant in an action by the holder of the equitable title.[58]

A person whose interests are identical with those of plaintiff may be joined as a defendant if he refuses to join in the bill.[59]

Where a deed was taken in the name of a husband and wife, and the wife, claiming the entire interest in the land, sued her husband and a person who bought his interest at execution sale, to remove the cloud from her title, there was no misjoinder of parties.[60]

§ 57. Intervention

As a general rule, persons who are interested in the subject matter of a suit to quiet title, or in the success of one of the parties, may intervene therein.

The term "all other persons unknown" etc., within quieting title statute and as used in describing unknown defendants in plaintiff's complaint, includes representatives, unknown heirs, and devisees of any person named as defendant who is not known by plaintiff to be dead.—Parker v. Ross, 217 P.2d 378.

Status of person who appears

In an action to quiet title in which an order is obtained for publication of summons as against unknown persons claiming any interest in the subject matter, one who appears in response to the published summons and claims an interest, regardless of his technical status, becomes a party and has a right to defend without obtaining leave, and it is error to strike his answer and require him to proceed by intervention.—Mulvey v. San Juan Metals Corporation, 75 P.2d 1044, 102 Colo. 1.

In Indiana

(1) The purpose of the statute was to provide a method by which the unknown husband or wife, widower or widow, heirs or devisees, of any and all such persons appearing of record as a former owner or encumbrancer might be made a party defendant and bound by a decree quieting plaintiff's title as to such husband or wife, widower or widow, heir or devisee, whose name was unknown to plaintiff.—Bastin v. Myers, 144 N.E. 425, 82 Ind.App. 325.

(2) In a later case, however, it was held that the purpose of the statute was to provide an additional and more comprehensive remedy for curing defective title against the world and not to provide a method by which unknown husband or wife, widow or widower, heir or devisee, of any and all such persons appearing of record as former owner or encumbrancer might be made party defendant and be bound by decree quieting plaintiff's title.—Grantham Realty Corporation v. Bowers, 22 N. E.2d 832, 215 Ind. 672.

ened by the intervention.[62] Conversely, persons without such interest are not entitled to intervene.[63] The interest which will entitle a party to intervene must, it has been said, be of such a direct and immediate character that the intervener will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation of the judgment or decree entered.[64] Accordingly, it has been held that the contingency of being held liable on covenants of warranty given to one of the parties is not such an interest,[65] although there is authority to the contrary.[66] Among others who have been permitted to intervene[67] are judgment lien claimants,[68] mortgagees,[69] purchasers before commencement of the suit,[70] and persons claiming to be cotenants of defendant.[71]

On the other hand, it has been held that neither a judgment creditor[72] nor his assignee[73] is entitled to come in and set up the judgment lien as an estate adverse to plaintiff's estate and interest. Likewise, a person may not intervene for the purpose of quieting his title, as against plaintiff, to another tract of land not in dispute between plaintiff and defendant.[74] Persons interested in the subject matter, who are not made parties to the action, but who, without objection, join with the parties in an agreement to arbitrate, are afterward properly regarded as parties to the action.[75]

Purchasers pendente lite. Purchasers who acquire an interest in the property pending the suit have no right to intervene,[76] unless the statute authorizes such intervention.[77] However, it has been held that, where a deed is made pendente lite, or under such circumstances that the grantee cannot defend his title to the property in his own name, he may do so in the name of his grantor, and may intervene for such purpose.[78] Permitting a purchaser pendente lite to become a party defendant is not error, although he is not a necessary party, where no prejudice results from his admission.[79]

Effect of default of named defendants. A person claiming title, adverse to plaintiff and the defendant named, will not be precluded from intervening by the fact that default has been taken against one or all of the named defendants.[80]

Leave to intervene. The right to intervene is not absolute,[81] and one desiring to intervene should apply for, and obtain, leave of court when the right to intervene is in the discretion of the court,[82] but the absence of such application and leave, where issues have been fully joined, does not go to the jurisdiction, but must be treated as an irregularity only.[83]

Time of intervention. The right to intervene should be claimed within a reasonable time,[84] and what constitutes a reasonable time is a matter within the discretion of the court.[85] Although it has been held that the court, acting on principles of justice, may, in cases not provided for by the code, permit a person to intervene either before or after judgment, for the protection of some right with respect to the subject matter,[86] it has also been held that a person has no right to intervene after the entry of final judgment and the expiration of the term at which the judgment was entered.[87]

Conditions imposed. The court may in its discretion impose conditions on which intervention will be allowed.[88]

Rights of interveners. Interveners in a suit to quiet title may object that the court has no jurisdiction of the subject matter.[89] Interveners have the right to file pleadings of their own, or they may adopt part or all of the pleadings already filed.[90] While the complaint in intervention must state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action,[91] immaterial matters need not be alleged.[92] Thus, it is unnecessary for intervener to plead the infirmity of the claims of the various defendants;[93] it is sufficient to allege that the defendants each claimed some interest in the property.[94] A warrantor intervening in an action to quiet title, for the purpose of defending the vendee's title, may plead any defense which defendant might have pleaded.[95]

(1) In general.—Thomson v. Nygaard, 41 P.2d 1, 98 Mont. 529.

(2) To support judgment quieting title in intervener.—Dittmar v. Alamo Nat. Co., 91 S.W.2d 781, affirmed 118 S.W.2d 298, 132 Tex. 44.

Complaint held insufficient
In an action under statute dealing with action to establish title when neither claimant is in possession, a petition of intervention setting up title and possession in an intervener, and asking for judgment against plaintiff and defendant, decreeing the intervener to be the owner in possession of property, disclosed no cause of action.—Bonnabel v. Police Jury, Parish of Jefferson, 44 So.2d 872, 216 La. 798—Fortner v. Good Pine Lumber Co., 83 So. 319, 146 La. 11.

Cure or aider
Defect, if any, in intervener's complaint as not sufficiently alleging that intervener's predecessor had interest in property, to which plaintiff and intervener sought to quiet title, was cured by defendants' answer, showing that their rights, if any, came through such predecessor.—Thomson v. Nygaard, 41 P.2d 1, 98 Mont. 529.

Payment of mortgage
(1) Bill to quiet title which disclosed that complainant, by his assumption of mortgage which defendant held on land had become principal debtor under mortgage, was insufficient in absence of allegation of payment of mortgage debt.—Federal Land Bank of New Orleans v. Vinson, 18 So.2d 865, 246 Ala. 95.

(2) In action to quiet title to property covered by mortgage, burden of alleging payment is on person asserting rights by reason of payment.—Korfoot v. Kessner, 84 N.E.2d 190, 227 Ind. 58.

Trespass or damage
Complaint was not required to allege a trespass or damage to state a cause of action under statute authorizing any person in possession of realty, or having or claiming title to vacant or unoccupied realty, to bring an action to determine adverse claims and rights of parties.—Tolbert v. Greenwood Cotton Mill, 48 S.E.2d 599, 213 S.C. 43.

Complaint showing laches
Petition for equitable relief of removal of cloud from title states no cause of action, where petition shows complainant guilty of laches.—City of Corpus Christi ex rel. Harris v. Flato, Tex.Civ.App., 88 S.W.2d 433, error dismissed.

Restrictive covenants
In order to warrant the removal of restrictive covenants from land, the bill must allege such a changed state of circumstances as will frustrate or bring to naught the effect of the covenants, and that such change was not brought about by the fault of those who seek to have restriccomplaint in an action under a statute is sufficient if it follows the language of the statute,[97] or embodies the essential averments required thereby,[98] or substantially sets forth the real essentials necessary for a recovery,[99] although a complaint which pleads the bare language of the statute and does not plead facts has been held insufficient.[1] In stating a cause of action under the statute, the rules of pleading which govern ordinary civil actions are applicable,[2] such as the requirement of certainty,[3] consistency,[4] tions removed—Dade County v. Thompson, 200 So 212, 146 Fla 66.

Relief

A statutory bill to quiet title may contain averments of fact on which to predicate relief beyond that provided for in the statute—Ex parte Baird, 200 So. 601, 240 Ala. 585.

or directness and positiveness.[5] However, this does not mean that the ordinary rules of pleading shall be so closely observed as to defeat the main purpose of the action, but only that general civil procedure, adjusted to the peculiar action, be followed.[6] While it has been held that a cause of action to quiet title pleaded in the general form is sufficient, although fraud is one of its constituent elements,[7] where fraud or estoppel is relied on, the facts constituting the fraud[8] or estoppel[9] must ordinarily be stated.

Since, as discussed supra § 6, the jurisdiction of equity to quiet title or remove a cloud ordinarily is not ousted by the existence of a statutory remedy, a bill brought in equity, and not under the statute, is not insufficient for failure to allege the facts necessary to be stated in the statutory action,[10] and the equity of such a bill must be found on settled principles of equity jurisprudence for removing a cloud on title.[11] Thus, in accordance with the principle that equity will not interfere to remove a cloud on title where the invalidity of the instrument or claim complained of appears on its face, as discussed supra § 13, right of complainant to have cloud on title removed without statutory allegations depends on whether the instrument or claim of defendant on its face shows an apparent superior right, and complainant, in order to show its invalidity, would be compelled to offer extrinsic evidence,[12] and, if invalidity of the instrument or claim of defendant appears on its face, complainant must set forth statutory allegations.[13] A statute authorizing confirmation of tax titles, provided petitioner shall have paid taxes on the land for a specified period after expiration of the right of redemption, does not apply to an adversary suit in chancery to litigate conflicting titles, so as to require plaintiff to allege the payment of such taxes.[14]

Surplusage and immaterial allegations. A bill or complaint to quiet title is not rendered insufficient because of surplusage,[15] or the averment of immaterial[16] or cumulative[17] facts, if enough is stated to entitle plaintiff to relief.

Construction. Whether a bill or complaint is one to quiet title is determined by the allegations thereof and the nature of the relief sought,[18] and not necessarily by the designation given to the pleading by the pleader.[19] Furthermore, although a bill is brought primarily to obtain relief from a forfeiture, it may, if no forfeiture has occurred, be treated as a bill to quiet title, provided it contains the requisite averments and a prayer for general relief.[20]

Establishment of title at law and pendency of other suits. Where previous establishment of title at law in plaintiff is essential, as discussed supra § 11, the bill or complaint should allege that plaintiff's title has been established by trial at law.[21] A bill averring that complainant's title has been fully adjudicated in his favor by a court of competent jurisdiction in suits brought against persons in like situation with defendant is, in that respect, sufficient.[22]

Where the statute authorizes a suit to try title only in cases where there is no action pending to test the validity of the title, the bill must aver that no such action is pending.[23]

Waiver and cure of defects. The omission or insufficient allegation of a material fact in the complaint is cured by its admission or averment in the answer,[24] although plaintiff may not rely on a pleading of his adversary where he has specifically denied in his reply the allegations which he later relies on for assistance;[25] and the fact that there is a demurrer to the complaint reserved in the answer does not take the case out of the rule of express waiver.[26] In like manner an omission or insufficient allegation in the complaint may be cured by a reply.[27]

It is too late to object for the first time at the trial or hearing that the bill or complaint omits a material fact, where the objection should have been raised by demurrer or answer.[28] So, objections to the bill or complaint because of multifariousness,[29] or misjoinder of causes of action,[30] are waived by failure to raise such objection by demurrer or answer, and the same rule applies to technical objections to the bill.[31] So, where the answer includes affirmative defenses inconsistent with the defense of misjoinder of defendants and causes of action, the defense of misjoinder is waived.[32] However, where a bill alleges possession in plaintiff, and the answer denies this and alleges that defendant is in possession, defendant does not waive his right to question the jurisdiction of the court because he fails to set up in his answer specifically that plaintiff is not entitled to relief because he has an adequate remedy at law.[33]

The necessity of alleging possession in plaintiff may be waived by failure, either by demurrer or answer, to raise an objection, on that ground, to the jurisdiction of the court.[34] So, where defendant sets up an affirmative defense in the nature of a counterclaim, he waives want of possession in plaintiff, as discussed supra § 31, and, therefore, failure of the bill or complaint to allege such possession.[35]

Failure to allege a material fact is not error after judgment, where the proof establishes the existence of such fact,[36] although there is authority to the effect that defects in the complaint may be remedied by proof but only to the extent of making definite and certain that which has been averred in the complaint,[37] but that it is never of any avail to prove what has not been charged.[38]

§ 59. —— Allegations as to Title or Interest of Plaintiff

Generally, the bill or complaint, by appropriate allegations, must show title in the plaintiff to the property in controversy at the time when the action was commenced.

Except where the action is brought under a statute which expressly or by construction dispenses with the necessity of alleging title,[39] or except where the statute makes mere possession sufficient to support the action,[40] the bill or complaint, by appropriate allegations, must show title,[41] either legal title or complete equitable title,[42] in plaintiff to the property in controversy, and the nature of the title, whether legal or equitable, must appear.[43] Aside from statute, it has been held that plaintiff must either allege title, or aver that he is in possession.[44]

Averments as to title must be made in accordance with the general rules as to certainty, positiveness, and the like,[45] and title must be stated with sufficient certainty to enable the court to see that plaintiff has such a right as warrants its interference.[46] Hence, the complaint must allege clearly and directly, and with certainty to a common intent, title in plaintiff,[47] but, where plaintiff claims under a deed correcting a former deed which contained an erroneous description of the property, allegations in respect of the first deed are unnecessary.[48]

Plaintiff need not deraign his title in the complaint,[49] or set out the chain of title relied on,[50] but an averment of title in general terms,[51] or an averment of the ultimate fact of title to the land,[52] such as an averment that plaintiff is the owner,[53] or the owner in fee simple,[54] or the owner of a complete equitable title,[55] is sufficient, without setting out specifically the character or source of title, unless the statute so requires,[56] as where a deraignment of title must be set forth.[57] However, cases

Common grantor
(1) One suing to quiet title to land under common grantor rule need not plead his intent to rely on such rule.—Wagnor v. Blume, 161 P. 2d 1001, 71 Cal.App.2d 94.

(2) A petition to quiet title to part of tract, alleged to have been originally conveyed by person named therein to another named person and come by mesne conveyances to plaintiffs, with reservations of such part for use and benefit of schools and churches as long as used for such purposes, was not demurrable on grounds that plaintiffs must rely on strength of their own title, not weakness of defendants' title, and because no common grantor was shown, plead title back to commonwealth, since plaintiffs derived title and defendants their right of use from original grantor, even though he was not common grantor because dedication was not strictly a grant.—Egner v. Requisites and sufficiency of deraignment
(1) Complainant suing to remove cloud must deraign title from ultimate source, or show title by adverse possession, or from defendant, or must show superior title from common source with defendant.—Rabinowitz v. Houk, 129 So. 501, 100 Fla. 44—51 C.J. p 218 note 89 [a].

(2) "Deraignment of title," within statute requiring complainant to set forth in plain and concise language deraignment of his title, means that complainant must show either title in himself from the government down, or title in himself by adverse possession, or title in himself from defendant, or that parties to the suit claimed under a common source, the complainant having the better title from that source.—Smith v. Overstreet, 38 So.2d 923, 205 Miss. 488—Long v. Staley, 30 So. 823, 79 Miss. 298.

(3) In suit to quiet title where the character of defendant's claim to the land involved is unknown to complainant, complainant must deraign his title from the government may arise in which it is advisable to set out the facts in detail.[58]

Claim from common source. Where both parties claim under a common grantor, it need not be alleged that such grantor had title,[59] since neither party will be permitted to deny it, as discussed supra § 19, but plaintiff must, by averment, connect his title with that of the common grantor,[60] and show by proper allegation that his title from such common source is the better.[61] If the bill deraigns title from a common source, and affirmatively shows a good title in defendant and no title in plaintiff, it is demurrable.[62] Furthermore, where deraignment of title is required by statute, a bill alleging that the property was derived from a common source who owned the property has been held insufficient and demurrable for failure to show facts of the title of the common source.[63]

Averring facts showing title. If the facts stated in the complaint show title in plaintiff, a direct averment of title is unnecessary,[64] and a complaint is not insufficient merely by reason of the inclusion of unnecessary allegations concerning plaintiff's title,[65] since insufficient or incomplete special allegations of title by plaintiff also pleading title generally may be treated as surplusage.[66] However, special allegations of title, if sufficient in themselves, control general allegations,[67] and, if the complaint avers generally that plaintiff is seized in fee simple, and then proceeds to set forth the facts which constitute his title, it is bad if the facts so stated do not show title in him,[68] unless the specific facts averred are not for the purpose of tracing title, but to show a right to other relief sought.[69] An allegation that plaintiff is the true and equitable owner "by purchase in fee simple from" a named grantor is insufficient, unless it is further averred that such grantor had title.[70] On the other hand, a general allegation of ownership will control with respect to instruments annexed to the complaint by way of description, to define the nature of the rights claimed by plaintiff, although such instruments may not show a sufficient deraignment of title.[71] Where plaintiff unnecessarily sets out his own and defendant's chain of title from a common source, the petition is insufficient unless it shows that plaintiff's deed was prior to that of defendant.[72]

Where an equitable title is claimed, all the facts that go to maintain such title may be alleged in the complaint.[73]

Time of ownership. The bill must allege that plaintiff was the owner of the land at the time when suit was commenced,[74] and a mere averment that plaintiff had title at some previous time is not sufficient.[75] However, a complaint which alleges that plaintiff had title at the time when the action was commenced is not vitiated by other allegations showing that he had conveyed the land to another, where such conveyance was alleged to have been obtained by duress, so that no title passed,[76] or where it is averred that the conveyance was long down.—Woodard v. Moss, 30 So.2d 420, 202 Miss. 33.

(4) A bill in proceeding requiring deraignment of title does not state a case against defendant thereto unless deraignment is sufficient, since complainant must depend on strength of his own title and not weakness of that of his adversary. —Smith v. Overstreet, supra—Dorsey v. Sullivan, 24 So.2d 852, 199 Miss. 602.

Effect of subsequent allegations

If by use of words "the common source of title" complainant intended to allege that named person was the common source from which he and defendant derived their titles, complainant negatived any knowledge thereof, and, therefore, the value of the allegation by thereafter alleging that defendant asserted some character or claim or pretended character or claim to the land of which complainant has no knowledge or had no knowledge at the time he purchased the land.—Woodard v. Moss, supra.

§ 60. —— Allegations as to Possession of Plaintiff

Where the plaintiff claims a legal estate or interest he must affirmatively allege in his bill or complaint that he is in possession of the lands in controversy, or that such lands are vacant and unoccupied, or wild lands; but the bill need not allege possession where it states facts sufficient to show that the estate or interest is equitable in its nature, or where the primary relief sought is based on some distinct equitable ground and the removal of a cloud is sought only as an incident to such relief.

Except where the action is brought under a statute which expressly or by necessary implication dispenses with the necessity of possession as a condition precedent to the maintenance of the action,[78] or unless defendant asserts his own title and asks for affirmative relief so as to give the court jurisdiction of the whole controversy, as discussed supra § 31, plaintiff, claiming a legal estate or interest, must affirmatively allege in his bill or complaint that he is in possession of the lands in controversy,[79] or that

Neither party in possession

Under statute allowing suit to establish title to land where none of the parties is in actual possession, petition must allege that neither of the parties to the proceedings is in actual possession of the land.—Doll v. Dearie, La.App., 41 So.2d 84.

In Arizona

(1) Under statute plaintiff out of possession may maintain action and need not allege possession or right of possession.—Palmer v. Sunnyside Gold & Development Co., 61 P.2d 444, 48 Ariz. 327—Floyd v. Hornbeck, 4 P.2d 908, 39 Ariz. 178—Chuk v. Katich, 281 P. 923, 27 Ariz. 182.

(2) Under prior similar statute, court held that plaintiff out of possession must allege that he has no adequate remedy at law, and must allege grounds for equitable relief.—Ely v. New Mexico & A. R. Co., 19 P. 6, 2 Ariz. 420.

In Florida

(1) Under statute it is no longer necessary to allege possession.—Griffin v. Bolen, 5 So.2d 690, 149 Fla. 377—Conway v. Wilson, 181 So. 385, 132 Fla. 404.

(2) Under prior law, except where a statute allowed a person out of possession to sue to quiet title against any person not in actual possession claiming adverse interest, plaintiff who had legal title had to allege in bill of complaint that he was in possession of land, or that it was vacant and unoccupied.—Zetteriund v. Stratton, 113 So. 562, 93 Fla. 1113—51 C.J. p 220 note 14, p 221 note 15.

In Texas

(1) In suits to remove cloud from title, plaintiff need not aver that he is in possession.—Day Land & Cattle Co. v. State, 4 S.W. 865, 68 Tex. 526—Johnson v. Miller, Civ.App., 173 S.W.2d 280, affirmed 177 S.W.2d 249, 142 Tex. 228.

(2) Formerly it was held that plaintiff must allege possession—Herrington v. Williams, 31 Tex. 448.

In West Virginia

(1) Under statute plaintiff need not allege possession of the land in controversy.—Bennett v. Neff, 42 S.E.2d 793, 130 W.Va. 121—Pocahontas Coal & Coke Co. v. Bower, 163 S.E. 421, 111 W.Va. 712—Flynn Coal & Lumber Co. v. F. W. White Lumber Corporation, 157 S.E. 588, 110 W.Va. 262.

(2) By virtue of statute allegation of possession by plaintiff in suit to remove cloud from title is not jurisdictional, but possession is important element in considering laches—Maze v. Bennett, 171 S.E. 249, 114 W.Va. 169.

(3) Prior to statute plaintiff who had a clear and equitable title had to allege possession, although bill did not have to allege possession in plaintiff if it stated facts sufficient to show that the estate or interest to be protected was equitable in its nature.—Mustard v. Adequate remedy

(1) The reason for general rule, requiring a plaintiff to allege actual possession in himself in order to be entitled to maintain an equitable petition to remove a cloud on his title, is that, where defendant is in possession, plaintiff has a remedy to test his title at law by bringing an action in ejectment, which is ordinarily deemed an adequate remedy, and in consequence there is no ground for exercise of equitable jusuch lands are vacant and unoccupied,[80] or wild lands,[81] or the bill must state facts sufficient to show that, although out of possession, plaintiff's remedies at law are inadequate.[82] However, the bill need not allege possession in plaintiff where it states facts sufficient to show that the estate or interest to be protected is equitable in its nature,[83] or where the primary relief sought is based on some distinct equitable ground and the removal of a cloud is sought only as an incident to that relief,[84] or where there is a distinct ground of equity jurisdiction sufficient to support the action.[85] It has been held that failure to allege possession in plaintiff is not a jurisdictional defect.[86]

Right of possession. The right of possession of realty attaches to the legal title,[87] and, where a perfect title is set out in the bill, it is not necessary to allege the right of immediate possession.[88]

Sufficiency. The fact of possession in plaintiff must be clearly stated in the bill, and not left to inference merely,[89] but an averment in the language of the statute is sufficient.[90] It is sufficient to aver possession in general terms,[91] unless in addition thereto other specific facts and circumstances are alleged which show that in fact plaintiff has not a sufficient possession.[92] Possession need not be averred in terms if the facts stated show such possession;[93] but in the absence of such a showing possession should be directly averred.[94] An averment of ownership in fee simple has been held a sufficient allegation of possession,[95] but there is also authority to the contrary.[96] An averment that plaintiff is entitled to immediate possession does not necessarily imply that he is not in possession.[97]

Making more definite and certain. If defendant is in doubt as to plaintiff's possession, he may move to make the complaint more definite and certain.[98] risdiction.—Northwest Atlanta Bank v. Manning, 17 S.E.2d 547, 193 Ga. 186.

(2) Where the basic reason on which general rule requiring a plaintiff to allege actual possession in himself rests is absent in a particular instance, the rule itself should not be applied.—Northwest Atlanta Bank v. Manning, supra.

Actual possession. Since the possession required to maintain the action usually means actual, as distinguished from mere constructive, possession, as discussed supra § 32, the bill or complaint must show actual possession in plaintiff,[99] unless the statute makes constructive possession sufficient.[1] An averment in general terms that plaintiff is in possession,[2] or in peaceable possession,[3] is prima facie equivalent to an averment of actual possession. An averment that plaintiff is legally in possession, or an averment equivalent thereto, is insufficient as an averment of actual possession.[4]

Peaceable possession. If the statute requires "peaceable" possession as a condition precedent to the right of action, as distinguished from disputed or scrambling possession, plaintiff must allege that his possession is peaceable,[5] although another section of the statute declares that the bill must allege "possession and ownership."[6] If the action is not strictly under the statute, however, but is brought by the owner in possession to remove a cloud, plaintiff need not aver a peaceable possession.[7]

An averment of possession as to a part of the premises is insufficient where it is sought to remove a cloud from the entire tract.[8]

§ 61. —— Allegations as to Inadequacy of Remedy at Law

Where one in possession of land, claiming the legal title, sues to remove a cloud thereon or to quiet title, he need not allege that he has no adequate remedy at law, but in a suit to prevent the imposition of a cloud the bill must affirmatively show the inadequacy of any remedy at law.

Where one in possession of land, claiming the legal title, sues to remove a cloud thereon or to quiet title, he need not allege that he has no adequate remedy at law;[9] but in a suit to prevent the imposition of a cloud the bill must affirmatively show the inadequacy of any remedy at law.[10] Where plaintiff is out of possession, the bill or complaint in an equitable action must show that his remedies at law are inadequate,[11] and this has been applied to an action under a statute giving a right of action to one out of possession.[12] On the other hand, it has been held that, in an action brought under a statute by one out of possession, plaintiff need not allege that he has no adequate remedy at law, especially in jurisdictions where both legal and equitable issues may be determined in one action.[13]

§ 62. —— Allegations as to Cloud or Adverse Claim

a. Cloud on title
b. Adverse claim

a. Cloud on Title

In a suit to remove a cloud on title, it must be shown in the bill that such a cloud exists, and in such a case, the bill must, in addition to specifying the writing or matter which constitutes the alleged cloud, state the facts which give it apparent validity, as well as those which show its invalidity.

Anticipating defense
Bill to remove cloud on title need not show defense or title by which defendant claims.—Sheaff v. Spindler, 171 N.E. 632, 339 Ill. 540.

Easement
Where plaintiff and assigns had been in continuous possession of premises subject to a recorded driveway easement in common with adjacent property but easement by mutual mistake had not been properly conveyed, an allegation that a cloud was cast on plaintiff's title by such in such case, the bill must, in addition to specifying the writing or matter which constitutes the alleged cloud,[15] as far as it is within plaintiff's knowledge,[16] state the facts which give it apparent validity,[17] as well as those which show its invalidity,[18] and a mere averment of its invalidity as a conclusion of the pleader is insufficient,[19] although a complaint alleging facts as to the alleged cloud may charge that, as a matter of law, the alleged cloud is void.[20] A bill to remove as a cloud on title, because of failure of consideration, a mortgage and secured notes in the hands of others than the mortgagee need not show wherein the notes are not negotiable;[21] but, if they are negotiable and defendants are bona fide purchasers, this is defensive matter.[22]

Sustaining complaint on different theory. It has been held that a complaint which is clearly framed as one to remove a specified cloud on title, if defective as such, cannot be sustained as a complaint under the statute to determine an adverse claim, although it states facts showing that plaintiff might have maintained such statutory action.[23]

Where it is sought to prevent a cloud on title, it must be averred that the acts which will impose the cloud are threatened or contemplated,[24] and, if this appears only by inference, the complaint is insufficient.[25]

b. Adverse Claim

In a statutory action to quiet title or determine adverse claims the plaintiff must allege or show that the defendant is asserting some claim to the land hostile or adverse to plaintiff's title or interest. The rule prevails in a few jurisdictions that the complaint must state the facts showing the nature of defendant's title or claim, while in others the view obtains that the plaintiff, except in case of fraud, need not particularly state the nature, extent, and circumstances of the defendant's claim.

In a statutory action to quiet title or determine adverse claims plaintiff must allege or show that defendant is asserting some claim to the land[26] hostile or adverse to plaintiff's title or interest.[27]

Nature of claim. The rule prevails in a few ju-

Interest in lien
City, claiming to be holder of lien against ten lots in special improvement district for unpaid assessments, could not maintain a quiet title action against owners of the real property on which the lien was claimed under statute authorizing action to quiet title to personal property on ground that lien constituted personal property, in absence of any allegation showing that owners of real property claimed any adverse interest in the lien.—City of Cut Bank v. Clapper Motor Co., 182 P.2d 474, 120 Mont. 274.

risdictions that the complaint must state facts showing the nature of defendant's title or claim,[28] while in others the view obtains that plaintiff, except in case of fraud,[29] need not particularly state the nature, extent, and circumstances of defendant's claim,[30] or deny knowledge thereof,[31] but that the pleading is sufficient if it alleges in general terms, or states facts which show, that defendant is asserting some claim adverse to plaintiff,[32] and that it is wrongful,[33] and calls on defendant to set it forth in his answer so that its validity may be submitted to the judgment of the court.[34] In those jurisdictions where it is not necessary to state the nature of defendant's claims, the complaint may set up the claims of the opposing party,[35] and the insertion of such allegations in the complaint, although improper,[36] does not necessarily render the complaint insufficient,[37] and a complaint which avers that defendant asserts an adverse claim is not insufficient because it goes further and alleges the source of defendant's claim, even though such allegation shows that the claim is so unfounded as to occasion no doubt of plaintiff's title,[38] but such allegations render the complaint insufficient where they disclose an insufficiency of title or interest in plaintiff to maintain the action.[39]

Invalidity of claim. In some jurisdictions the complaint must state facts showing the invalidity of defendant's title or claim,[40] as far as the facts are within plaintiff's knowledge,[41] but in other jurisdictions this is not required,[42] and, if the complaint does contain allegations as to such defects, it is not for that reason demurrable,[43] but such allegations may be disregarded as surplusage.[44]

Where unknown persons are proceeded against as claiming some interest in the land, the petition should state the nature of such interest or claim, as far as known to plaintiff,[45] and set out facts showing the validity or invalidity of the claim.[46]

§ 63. —— Allegations as to Parties

Where a person sought to be made a party is dead, his death must be alleged if his heirs or devisees are to be proper parties Where the statute so requires, the bill or complaint should name the persons who claim or are claimed or reputed to have the title, lien, or encumbrance.

Where a person sought to be made a party is dead, his death must be alleged if his heirs or devisees are to be proper parties.[47]

Names. Where the statute so requires, the bill or complaint should name the persons who claim or are claimed or reputed to have the title, lien, or encumbrance,[48] or allege that they are unknown.[49] A petition alleging that a named defendant, "or his unknown heirs," are asserting an adverse interest is insufficient.[50]

Residence. It is the better practice, and it is sometimes necessary in order to show jurisdiction, to aver the residence of the parties,[51] if known;[52] but a bill which alleges that the premises in controversy are located in the county in which the suit is brought is sufficient, although the bill does not allege the residence of the parties.[53] Where complainant is a resident of the county in which the suit is brought, and defendant unconditionally appears, failure to aver the residence of the parties is immaterial.[54]

§ 64. —— Location and Description of Land

The petition in a suit to quiet title should show that the property in dispute is situated in the county in which the action is brought, and the plaintiff's pleading must contain a pertinent description of the property in controversy; otherwise it is fatally defective.

The petition in a suit to quiet title should show that the property in dispute is situated in the county in which the action is brought.[55] Plaintiff's pleading must also contain a pertinent description of the property in controversy,[56] and must conform to any statutory requirement in that regard;[57] otherwise it is fatally defective.[58] Such description must be definite and accurate.[59] However, a description as definite as can be in the nature of things,[60] or which is sufficiently definite to identify the property, either in itself,[61] or by the aid of extraneous evidence,[62] suffices.

§ 65. —— Offering to Do Equity

Although in statutory actions to quiet title the plaintiff in his bill or complaint may not be required to offer to do equity, the general rule in equity that plaintiff in his bill must offer to do equity applies to bills to remove clouds on title.

Although in statutory actions to quiet title plaintiff in his bill or complaint may not be required to offer to do equity,[63] the general rule in equity that plaintiff in his bill must offer to do equity applies to bills to remove clouds on title.[64] Accordingly, when the object of the action is the removal of a cloud on plaintiff's title, which is created by a contract or agreement executed by him, he must expressly offer in his bill to do equity by restoring or repaying whatever he may have received under the contract or agreement sought to be canceled.[65]

Sufficiency of offer. While better pleading demands a direct and unconditional offer to repay such sums as plaintiff must pay as a condition of relief,[66] an offer by plaintiff to pay defendant whatever sum may be due on account of the matters set forth in the bill is a substantial offer to do equity and is sufficient.[67]

§ 66. —— Prayer for Relief

Ordinarily there should be an express prayer that plaintiff's title be quieted, and for an injunction or such other appropriate relief as may be desired.

Ordinarily there should be an express prayer that plaintiff's title be quieted,[68] and for an injunction or such other appropriate relief as may be desired,[69] but a specific prayer to cancel instruments or claims is not necessary,[70] and, where the bill contains a special prayer for relief to which plaintiff is not entitled, such prayer may be disregarded.[71] Subject to the rule of multifariousness a bill for statutory relief may be joined with a prayer for other relief.[72] So it has been held that, when an action to quiet title lies at the instance of one not in possession, a prayer to recover possession may be united with a prayer that the cloud on title be removed,[73] and in a bill under the statute to quiet title a special prayer not in accordance with the statute will not destroy the equity of the bill.[74] However, issues tendered by a complaint cannot be extended beyond their natural import by anything contained in the prayer,[75] since the prayer for relief cannot be more extensive than the facts alleged in the body of the complaint.[76] Where the bill deraigns title in complainant and alleges the existence of a hostile claim in defendants, constituting a cloud on title, and follows such allegations with a prayer for relief which, although general in its terms, specifically prays relief against the clouds or other matters previously alleged, the bill is sufficient, notwithstanding the absence of a specific enumeration in the prayer of the particular clouds against which relief is sought,[77] although the ordinary or conventional prayer for "general relief" which usually forms the conclusion of the prayer to bills in chancery will not alone satisfy this rule.[78]

Dower agreement
In suit to have agreement between husband and wife purporting to keep alive wife's inchoate right of dower in husband's realty, notwithstanding subsequent absolute divorce decree, declared void, wherein wife claimed that husband induced wife to change her position to her prejudice, complaint, in view of allegation that wife had refused to release for its present cash value her inchoate right of dower, was not demurrable for failure to offer to do more equity. —Manton v. Manton, 50 A.2d 181, 72 R.I. 241.

Satisfaction of judgment
A complaint, in an action to quiet title, by one claiming under a second execution sale, alleging the invalidity of the first execution sale, was not objectionable because complainant did not offer to accept the amount of her judgment, since it had already been satisfied to the extent of the amount bid by the judgment creditor, and whatever title the debtor had passed by the sheriff's deed.—Worthington v. § 67. Plea or Answer in General

a. General rules
b. Denials
c. Admissions
d. Particular defenses

a. General Rules

A person against whom a suit to quiet title is brought is entitled to appear and answer; and the plea or answer must state a defense and conform to rules of pleading generally.

A person against whom a suit to quiet title is brought is entitled to appear and answer;[80] and the answer ordinarily must be made by the party required to answer.[81] There must be a compliance with statutory provisions with respect to answers,[82] such as provisions as to what the answer shall contain[83] and within what time it must be made.[84]

In accordance with the rules governing pleas and answers in civil actions generally, discussed in Pleading §§ 99–120, and in equity proceedings generally, discussed in Equity §§ 301–360, the answer must state facts sufficient to constitute a defense,[85] and each defense pleaded must be complete in itself.[86] However, the answer is not required to contain affirmative defenses as to matters not specifically pleaded by plaintiff.[87]

The allegations must be clear and definite,[88] and specific,[89] and, likewise, the allegations

Right held not waived

One appearing in response to a published summons addressed to unknown persons in an action to quiet title does not waive his statutory right to appear and answer by an attempted compliance with an erroneous order of the court striking his answer and requiring him to intervene.—Mulvey v. San Juan Metals Corporation, supra.

81. Cal.—Los Angeles First Nat. Trust & Savings Bank v. Northrup, 8 P.2d 528, 120 Cal.App. 677.

Answer held unauthorized

In vendor's action to quiet title, defendants claiming as assignees of purchaser were held not authorized to answer for such purchaser, and such pleading was a nullity.—Los Angeles First Nat. Trust & Savings Bank v. Northrup, supra.

Answer by grantee

Where vendors executed title bonds to three purchasers of land and after purchase price was paid land was conveyed to one purchaser with understanding that he should execute a deed to a part of the tract in favor of copurchaser, and purchaser did not execute deed but copurchaser took possession of part of tract and placed tenant on it and exercised possession of it until he sold it, and, in suit to quiet title by purchaser's heirs, copurchaser failed to answer, copurchaser's grantees were entitled to answer and make such claims to tract in question as copurchaser could have made.—Swaner v. Nash, 156 S.W.2d 852, 288 Ky. 485.

Suspension pending disposition of motion

Original time within which defendant was required to answer was suspended until motion to quash service of summons was disposed of, but defendant, if motion were denied, ran hazard of being in default if not then answering within time required and thus becoming subject to the challenged jurisdiction.—Venus Foods v. District Court of Eleventh Judicial Dist. in and for Twin Falls County, supra.

(1) In general.—Lowe v. Sory, 111 P.2d 1054, 107 Colo. 241—51 C.J. p 232 note 6 [d].

(2) In quiet title action, defendant abandoned interest in land, thereby conceding plaintiff's right to judgment, by claiming damages and alleging that state destroyed value of gas and oil lease by curtailing production.—Martin v. Hall, 36 P.2d 285, 219 Cal. 324.

(3) In quiet title action by husband whose wife and children, after his absence for more than seven years, had conveyed his land, paragraph in purchaser's answer setting forth such facts, alleging that purchaser became the owner by purchase from husband's son for a valuable and adequate consideration in cash, was demurrable.—Kinnett v. 88. N.J.—Phillips v. Vermeule, 102 A. 695, 88 N.J.Eq. 500.
51 C.J. p 232 note 8.

Answer held bad

In action to quiet title, defendant's answer was bad for uncertainty, ambiguity, and unintelligibility, where it was impossible to tell what right, title, or interest defendant claimed to have in the realty, or whether he claimed title, a lien, or some other interest, or whether he claimed any such interest in the whole or in some part thereof.—California Trust Co. v. Gustason, 101 P.2d 74, 15 Cal.2d 268.

Answer held insufficient

In action by property owner to vacate a municipal assessment as cloud on title, defense of plaintiff's failure to comply with charter and statute was held insufficient where there was no reference in the answer to par-must be relevant[90] and material,[91] and should state facts and not conclusions of law.[92] Matters alleged in the petition or complaint need not be set forth in the answer.[93] Ordinarily defendant should specially plead matters in confession and avoidance of the complaint,[94] although, as discussed infra § 75 c, it has been held in some jurisdictions that all defenses may be shown under a general denial.

A plea may be to the whole bill or to some distinct portion thereof.[95] Where the allegations of the plea, being taken as true, do not, as far as it purports to go, make a full and complete defense,[96] or where the necessary facts are to be gathered by inference alone,[97] it will not be sustained. It must be perfect in itself, so that if true, it will make an end of the case[98] or of that part of the case to which it applies.[99] If a plea is directed to a part of the bill it must definitely and exactly express to what part it extends;[1] and if the plea undertakes to answer the whole bill, but extends only to a part thereof, it is bad.[2]

Demurrers to answers are discussed infra § 73 a.

Description of land. A description in the answer by which the land may be identified by a competent surveyor with reasonable certainty, either with or without extrinsic evidence, is sufficient.[3] Where the statute requires that the answer describe the land claimed so that it may be identified, an answer which claims the whole land in controversy is sufficient where the petition contains a particular description.[4] However, if defendant claims only a part of the land in dispute, the answer must so describe such part that it may be identified;[5] but such requirement is mandatory only in the event that defendant is seeking affirmative relief.[6] It has been held that, where defendant claims a portion of the tract to which plaintiff asserts title, an answer accurately describing that portion, which includes a part inclosed by defendant, is sufficient to warrant judgment for the inclosed lands.[7]

Affirmative relief. It has been held that in a proper case an answer may contain a plea for affirmative relief.[8] Where it is an admitted fact that defendant is the record owner in fee of the property in issue, an answer containing general allegations of ownership by defendant is sufficient to authorize the granting of affirmative relief.[9] It has been held that, since the parties are already before the court, defendant is not required to file a lis pendens and obtain a proper summons before he can assert a request for affirmative relief by partition of the property involved.[10]

Partial defenses. An answer which does not deny plaintiff's title, but sets up that defendant has an easement in the land, is good as a partial defense to the action.[11] So an answer which confesses that the fee is in plaintiff may pro tanto defeat the action where, by appropriate and adequate averments, it sets forth that defendant holds a lien;[12] that is to say, it may at least secure a lienhold and provision in the decree, reserving, protecting, or enforcing his lien.[13] However, this rule cannot apply where the answer confesses that the fee is in plaintiff, and does no more than show that a stranger to the action holds an outstanding lien.[14]

Joinder and consolidation of defenses; inconsistent defenses. The general rule allowing several defenses to be pleaded, discussed in Pleading §§ 121–129, applies to actions to quiet title.[15] The fact that defendant's right to relief arose after the complaint was filed does not support a claim of misjoinder of defenses, where there is no repugnance or inconsistency in the several grounds of defense, the new matter pleaded affects all the parties and no others, and the transaction out of which defendant's right to relief arose is connected with the subject matter of the action.[16] So allegations of tax title and the facts by which it was acquired, in one defense in an answer, are in no wise inconsistent with a claim of title antecedent to it, and do not qualify the allegation of such antecedent title in a previously stated separate defense.[17] In jurisdictions where inconsistent defenses are allowed, defendant in an action to quiet title to a right of way may set up the defense that plaintiff's use of the way is merely permissive, and also that the right of way is a public highway, although such defenses are inconsistent.[18]

If certain defenses, repeated in separate denials of the answer, are, in substance, specifications of sources of title, the court may properly order them consolidated, and hence commits no error in merely striking the repetition of the denials.[19]

b. Denials

Ordinarily a denial of a material allegation of the bill or complaint is sufficient to raise an issue.

Ordinarily a denial of a material allegation of the bill or complaint is sufficient to raise an issue.[20] Under this rule a denial of plaintiff's title[21] or possession[22] is sufficient, without any affirmative allegation of title in defendant,[23] although an affirmative allegation which necessarily asserts that the allegation of the complaint is untrue is also a sufficient denial to raise an issue.[24] In some jurisdictions, however, it has been held that, in order to constitute a defense, defendant must set up some claim to, or interest in, the property,[25] and that, while a defense asserting an adverse title or claim, but containing no denials, is sufficient,[26] an answer consisting only of denials, or of denials and admissions, is insufficient.[27]

An argumentative denial,[28] or a denial in the form of a negative pregnant,[29] is insufficient, as is a denial of a mere conclusion of law.[30]

Matters not in bill. A defendant who claims protection as a bona fide purchaser without notice must deny such notice, although not distinctly alleged in the complaint;[31] and the pleader must deny fully, in the most precise terms, every circumstance from which notice could be inferred.[32]

c. Admissions

A defendant is bound by facts admitted in his answer or by material allegations of the complaint which he did not deny.

A defendant is bound by facts admitted in his answer.[33] Thus a direct admission that plaintiff is in possession binds defendant;[34] and the binding force of such admission is not avoided by a special averment that plaintiff obtained possession by fraud.[35] However, the admissions of one of several defendants are not binding on the other defendants.[36]

Material allegations of the complaint,[37] such as plaintiff's title[38] or possession,[39] if not denied when susceptible of a denial, stand admitted. Where defendant files a cross bill praying possession, he thereby admits that possession is in plaintiff.[40] If plaintiff alleges title by devise, and the answer contains only a general denial, the effect of the answer is to admit that plaintiff acquired such interest in the land as the devisor had at the time of his death.[41]

Construction. The statutory rule in some jurisdictions that pleadings shall be liberally construed in determining their effect applies in determining whether or not an admission has been made in the answer.[42]

d. Particular Defenses

Various defenses, including the defense that the defendant has title to the land, must be specially pleaded in the answer.

Various defenses are required to be specially pleaded;[43] and equitable defenses must be specifically pleaded.[44] Thus, where defendant seeks to avail himself of the defense that an adequate remedy at law exists,[45] or that the conveyance which plaintiff pleads as the basis of his title is fraudulent,[46] he must plead such defense in his answer; and, where it does not appear on the face of the complaint that the action is barred by limitations, the question can be presented only by answer.[47] However, in case of gross laches the court will refuse to entertain the suit, although defendant does not plead such defense in his answer.[48]

Title in defendant. Where defendant relies on the defense that title to the land is in him, he must set up such defense by appropriate allegations in his answer.[49] Any language which sets forth facts which show a good title in defendant, and which, by fair and reasonable construction, imports a denial of plaintiff's title and right of possession, is sufficient,[50] and defendant need not recite all the evidence by which his ownership is to be established,[51] or set forth the source of his title,[52] unless the statute so requires, either expressly[53] or by implication.[54] An answer which, without denying plaintiff's title, sets up an easement in the land as a full defense to the cause of action is bad.[55]

Generally, defendant, in order to avail himself of an equitable title as against plaintiff's legal title, should specifically plead it,[56] although in some jurisdictions a contrary rule obtains.[57] An answer setting up an equitable interest under a contract should allege the fairness of the contract and the adequacy of the consideration;[58] and, where the contract is one of sale, an answer which contains no statement of facts showing performance of conditions precedent by defendant, or excuse for nonperformance, fails to state a defense.[59]

Where the allegations of title in defendant are uncertain and indefinite, the remedy is by motion to make the answer more definite and certain,[60] and not by a request for a bill of particulars[61] or by an objection to the introduction of evidence.[62]

Adverse claim. It has been held that, in statutory proceedings to determine adverse claims, defendant, relying on an adverse claim in himself, must plead the nature of his claim,[63] although the claim need not be set forth at length where this has already been done in the complaint.[64]

On the other hand, it has been held that an answer denying plaintiff's ownership and right of possession and admitting that defendant claims some interest in the property is sufficient, without setting forth the nature of defendant's claim.[65]

Adverse possession. Where defendant pleads title in himself by adverse possession, the facts stated must be sufficient to constitute such defense;[66] and an answer purporting to set up the defense that defendant was in adverse possession of the lands when plaintiff took conveyance is bad for failure to aver that defendant entered, believing in good faith that he had title.[67] If the answer specifically denies plaintiff's ownership, and alleges title in defendant by adverse possession, it need not be accompanied by a plea that the action is barred by the statute of limitations.[68]

§ 68. Disclaimer

a. In general
b. Operation and effect

a. In General

Where the defendant does not claim an adverse interest he should appear and file a disclaimer, which consists of a denial of insistence on any claim or right in the property.

Where defendant, in a proceeding to quiet or remove a cloud from title, does not in fact claim any adverse interest, he should appear and file a disclaimer,[69] the purpose of which ordinarily is to save defendant from liability for costs.[70] A disclaimer consists of a denial of the insistence on any claim or right in the property, and the renunciation of all claim thereto,[71] and has been held so far to resemble a release or conveyance of the land that, in general, no person can disclaim who is not capable of conveying the land.[72]

In order to be effective, the disclaimer must be absolute and unqualified;[73] and a denial "except as hereinafter stated" is not an absolute disclaimer.[74] On the other hand, it has been held that, where the facts necessary to constitute a cause of action under the statute are the actual possession of the land by plaintiff, and some claim on the part of defendant, adverse to him, of an estate or interest in the land, an answer denying any interest thereunder other than a lien on the land amounts to a disclaimer.[75] It has been held that a disclaimer is a good answer when defendant is out of possession,[76] but that the rule is otherwise where he is in possession and, without denying or yielding possession, simply disclaims title.[77]

Whether a disclaimer is subject to demurrer is considered infra § 73 a.

Disclaimer as to part. If defendant does not claim a part of the land, he should specify in his answer the part disclaimed, and if he fails to do so it has been held that he must be treated as claiming the whole;[78] but it has also held that no formal disclaimer is necessary as to that part of the property not claimed by defendant.[79]

Answer with disclaimer. Under some circumstances a disclaimer must be accompanied by an answer in order to make it effective.[80]

b. Operation and Effect

A disclaimer usually operates as an estoppel, and bars any other assertion of the right renounced. It generally entitles the plaintiff, as of course, to a judgment quieting title to the property disclaimed.

A disclaimer by a defendant usually operates as an estoppel, and between the parties and their privies is an absolute bar to any other assertion of the right renounced.[81] While the effect of a disclaimer may be to relieve defendant from liability for costs, as discussed infra § 111, a disclaimer of any interest in the property in issue does not avoid a charge in the complaint as to a matter other than title to the property;[82] and a disclaimer by the principal defendant, after the appearance and filing of a cross bill by another defendant, does not affect the jurisdiction of the court.[83]

Where defendant, who had conveyed the land in controversy, disclaims, plaintiff is charged with notice of the grantee's rights.[84]

Judgment on disclaimer. Where defendant files a disclaimer, it is generally held that plaintiff is entitled as of course to a judgment quieting title to the land disclaimed,[85] without any limitation or qualification in defendant's favor,[86] and notwithstanding defects in the complaint.[87] This is so even though the answer puts in issue material allegations of the complaint;[88] but, as considered infra § 111, in such case the costs ordinarily will not be imposed on defendant. On the other hand, it has been held that, where possession is necessary to sustain the action, plaintiff is not entitled to judgment, even as to the property disclaimed, without proof of possession, if that fact is put in issue.[89] A judgment on disclaimer may be set aside and defendant and his grantees allowed to defend where the disclaimer was made through inadvertence and mistake of fact.[90]

Dismissal. It has been held that, if defendant disclaims, and plaintiff fails to prove any pretension of claim before suit brought, no cause of action is made out, and the suit should be dismissed.[91] So, where plaintiff sues to remove, as a cloud on the title to his homestead, the record of a judgment lien not of itself constituting a cloud on such property, and defendant disclaims any purpose to assert a claim thereon, there is no justiciable issue, and the bill will be dismissed.[92] Where defendant disclaims as to part of the land, the court may dismiss the action as to such part instead of giving plaintiff judgment therefor;[93] and, where one of the defendants disclaims, the action may be dismissed as to him.[94] On the other hand, it has been held that, where the court grants a nonsuit in favor of all defendants, one of whom had expressly disclaimed any interest, the nonsuit as to him is error.[95]

§ 70. —— Cross Bill or Cross Complaint and Answer Thereto

a. In general
b. Sufficiency of cross pleading
c. Pleadings in reply to cross pleading

a. In General

Where the defendant seeks affirmative relief, as where he seeks to have title quieted in himself, it is generally, although not universally, necessary or proper for him to file a cross pleading; but such cross pleading can generally be sustained only as to matters germane to those of the original bill.

It has been held that, where defendant relies on his own title and the relief demanded by him can be had on the averments of his answer, a cross bill or cross complaint is unnecessary,[96] and, if filed, may be stricken,[97] or may be treated as a mere answer containing affirmative matter.[98] However, where defendant seeks affirmative relief,[99] such as the enforcement of a mortgage or other lien against the property,[1] his right to file a cross complaint is recognized, especially where the relief sought is not obtainable on his answer,[2] and it has been held that only where defendant seeks affirmative relief,[3] outside the scope and purpose of a statutory proceeding to quiet title,[4] is a cross bill necessary or proper. So, where defendant asserts a superior title in himself and seeks to have such title quieted, he must,[5] or, at least, may,[6] file a cross complaint or a counterclaim in the nature thereof; and it has been held that where defendant's pleading asserts title in himself and seeks affirmative relief such pleading is,[7] or will be treated as,[8] a counterclaim, notwithstanding it is designated merely an answer.[9]

The rule that an original bill to quiet title cannot be maintained unless plaintiff is in possession, discussed supra §§ 26–31, does not require posses-

Propriety and necessity of cross bills in equity proceedings generally see Equity §§ 371–376.

Under statute so providing, petition in nature of cross bill need not be filed, and "defendant may set up in his answer any matter which, under the English practice, should be the subject of a cross bill;" and under such statute, in action by holder of a senior deed to cancel a junior recorded deed as cloud on title on ground that grantee had notice of existence of senior deed, answer of grantee in junior deed, denying averments as to notice or knowledge of senior deed and alleging that holder of senior deed had no title in land, and praying that his deed be canceled, was not purely defensive in nature, but sought affirmative relief against plaintiff as in a cross-action. —Terry v. Ellis, 7 S.E.2d 282, 189 Ga. 698.

In quiet title action, defendant had right to ask affirmative relief of partition without filing a formal cross complaint.—Munden v. Hayes, 202 P.2d 112, 89 Cal.App.2d 772.

Particular cross complaint held unnecessary
Where a single pleading denominated "answer and cross complaint" was filed by defendant in quiet title suit and portion of pleading under heading "answer" alleged ultimate facts, while the portion called "cross complaint" went more into detail in alleging probative facts, and prayer in pleading asked for nothing which could not be given under answer if it stood alone, cross complaint was unnecessary.—Crofton v. Young, 119 P.2d 1003, 48 Cal.App.2d 452.

Rescission
Where grantors to whom grantees had reconveyed land sought to quiet title thereto after grantees filed notice of rescission as to their deed of reconveyance, customary practice would be for defendant grantees to have filed a cross complaint for rescission on which proper issues would have been framed by pleadings.—Davies v. Symmes, 122 P.2d 102, 49 Cal.App.2d 433.

Affirmative relief sought
In suit to quiet title, answer by way of cross bill, setting forth matters on which defendants relied for their claim of title to the lands by way of defense to claim of plaintiff, as permitted by statute, could also properly seek the affirmative relief of having the parties adjudged joint owners and tenants in common to lands involved and that they be sold for division of proceeds among them. —Steele v. sion by cross complainant;[10] but the rule that a person who has no interest in the title to real estate cannot maintain an action to remove a cloud thereon or quiet title thereto, discussed supra § 16, applies to a defendant who seeks by cross petition to quiet title.[11]

Jurisdiction. Where, in a suit to quiet title, a cross bill is founded on matters clearly cognizable in equity, any defect in jurisdiction is supplied,[12] but equity will not take jurisdiction to vacate a deed because it is void on its face.[13] Where defendant files a cross complaint or a counterclaim in the nature thereof to quiet title in himself, equity will retain jurisdiction and determine the matter in issue even though the complaint did not give such jurisdiction;[14] and, as considered infra § 85, in a proper case a dismissal of plaintiff's bill will not necessarily carry with it defendant's cross bill.

Relation to subject matter of original bill. In general, a cross complaint can be sustained only in respect of matters germane to those of the original bill,[15] and hence generally will not lie to quiet a title distinct from that which plaintiff in his original bill prays to have quieted.[16] However, under a statute to that effect relating to cross complaints generally, while a cross complaint cannot be filed where the relief sought is in no way related to, or dependent on, any transaction on which the action to quiet title was brought or does not affect the property in issue,[17] a cross complaint is proper where it relates to or affects the property in issue,[18] or relates to, or depends on, the transaction involved in plaintiff's original action;[19] and where the same transaction is involved it is unnecessary that cross complainants have an interest in the property involved,[20] and the fact that the relief sought in a cross complaint is distinct from that demanded by plaintiff is immaterial.[21] Accordingly, under such statute, defendant may seek a money judgment, by way of cross complaint in a quiet title suit, where the complaint and the cross com-

Matter held germane
In action by grantee in senior deed to secure cancellation of junior recorded deed as cloud on title on ground of notice of existence of senior deed at time of execution of junior deed, cross action by grantee in junior deed, praying that senior deed be canceled, and for general relief, was germane to subject matter of original petition.—Terry v. Ellis, 7 S.E.2d 282, 189 Ga. 698.

Matter held not germane
In action to quiet title to land, a cross petition on promissory note alleged to have been given by plaintiff to defendant and his deceased sister was not germane to action to quiet title.—O'Shea v. O'Shea, 11 N.W.2d 540, 134 Neb. 843.

Cross complaint held improper
Cross complaint to quiet title, alleging that adjoining owners were entitled to mining claims by adverse possession, but failing to state that claims were part of section to which plaintiff in complaint claimed title, or were affected by plaintiff's claim, was demurrable as attempting to state a cause foreign to subject involved in complaint.—Garrett v. Cook, 200 P.2d 21, 89 Cal.App.2d 93.

Cross complaint held proper
In action to quiet title, where complaint alleged declaration of homestead, foreclosure of trust deed and commissioner's sale which was claimed to be void, cross complaint seeking to recover value of trustors' use and occupation of property during redemption period was authorized.—Carpenter v. Hamilton, 147 P.2d 563, 24 Cal.2d 95, 153 A.L.R. 733.

Same "transaction" involved
(1) In general.—Hanes v. Coffee, 300 P. 963, 212 Cal. 777—Bradbury v. Thomas, 27 P.2d 402, 135 Cal.App. 435.

(2) Cross complaint seeking to quiet title to realty other than that described in complaint and asking reformation of certain documents was proper where both parcels of land were involved in one transaction.—Hanlon v. Western Loan & Bldg. Co., 116 P.2d 465, 46 Cal.App.2d 580.

(3) Where defendants' only connection with property arises from contract, cross complaint asking that contract be reformed, and for damages, is authorized, since relating to "transaction" on which action is brought.—California Trust Co. v. Cohn, 7 P.2d 297, 214 Cal. 619.

(4) Action directed at all claims made by defendant under written instrument cross complaint for damages was held authorized, since relating to "transaction" on which action was brought.—Martin v. Hall, 26 P.2d 288, 219 Cal. 334.

No "transaction" set forth
Fact that complaint alleges only plaintiff's title and right to possession and sets forth no "transaction" is not conclusive of defendant's right to file cross complaint for damages under statute permitting cross complaint relating to "transaction" on which action is brought.—Martin v. Hall, supra.

20. Cal.—California Trust Co. v. Cohn, 7 P.2d 297, 214 Cal. 619.

plaint both arose out of the same transaction,[22] although a mere money demand unrelated to plaintiff's cause of action is not a proper subject for a cross complaint.[23] Under a statute so providing, a defendant may assert, by cross petition or cross bill, any claim, right, title, or interest concerning the real estate in issue which a plaintiff might assert in his original petition.[24]

Effect of cross bill or complaint. Where a cross bill or complaint is filed, the original bill and the cross bill then become but one cause,[25] the court has possession of, and will determine, the whole case,[26] and any attempt to require a treatment of the cross complaint as a separate case is unavailing.[27]

Cross complaint or petition against a codefendant may be maintained in a proper case.[28]

Premature filing. A cross complaint prematurely filed is properly stricken.[29]

Cross complaint as part of answer. An answer alleging that defendant's interest was "as will more fully hereinafter appear," followed by a cross complaint seeking specific performance of an agreement to lease, makes the cross complaint a part of the answer.[30]

In actions other than to quiet title, but affecting title to land, defendant has been held entitled to file a cross bill or cross complaint to have his title quieted.[31]

Waiver of objections. Where a cross complaint is filed, praying that title be quieted in defendant, a plaintiff who does not attack it by demurrer or motion to strike, but answers it and goes to trial on the merits, waives his right to object that such cross complaint is not a proper method of procedure in an action to quiet title.[32]

b. Sufficiency of Cross Pleading

The sufficiency of a cross pleading in an action to quiet title depends on whether it states a cause of action; and as a general rule a cross pleading to quiet title must set up such facts as are required in an original bill for that purpose.

In accordance with the rules governing the sufficiency of cross pleadings in civil actions generally, discussed in Pleading §§ 167-176, and in equity proceedings generally, discussed in Equity §§ 383-385, the sufficiency of a cross pleading in an action to quiet title is determined by whether or not it states a cause of action;[33] and as a general rule a cross bill or cross complaint to quiet title must set up such facts as are required in an original bill or complaint for the same purpose.[34] However, a cross

Cancellation of indenture

In action to quiet title by plaintiffs claiming title to the realty under a trust indenture, court had jurisdiction to permit defendants to file cross bill for cancellation of indenture on ground that one who executed the indenture was of unsound mind, that indenture was prepared without his consent, and that he was induced to sign the indenture by fraud and undue influence.—Young v. Pressgrove, 195 S.W.2d 516, 355 Mo. 204.

In Arizona

(1) It was formerly held, under a statute so providing, that in an action to recover possession of property there could be no counterclaim except of like proceedings, and a counterclaim to quiet title would not be maintainable.—Tolmachoff v. Eshbaugh, 18 P.2d 256, 41 Ariz. 318.

(2) That statute has been superseded by a statute relating to counterclaims generally, under which it is held that in an action to quiet title and recover possession of realty, counterclaim to quiet title on the theory of adverse possession is properly made.—Keystone Copper Min. Co. v. Miller, 161 P.2d 803, 63 Ariz. 544.

complainant need not allege a demand, since he is not the moving party, but is brought into court by plaintiff, and challenged to litigate the matters in controversy.[35] Where a cross complaint is equitable in nature, the sufficiency of the pleading will be determined in accordance with equitable principles.[36]

While it has been held that a cross complaint must be good within itself without aid from other pleadings in the cause,[37] it has also been held that such pleading may be aided by the allegations of plaintiff's petition.[38] Where defendant's cross pleading is otherwise sufficient to warrant the quieting of title in him, the fact that he incorrectly names the character of relief to which he is entitled will not defeat recovery;[39] and, where defendant's pleading contains all the essential elements of a cross complaint, the fact that it is called a "counterclaim" does not determine its character or affect the rights of the parties.[40]

Multifariousness. A cross bill to quiet title under the statute is not multifarious because it seeks relief beyond that provided by statute[41] or because the various defendants do not have the same measure of interest.[42]

Consistency with answer. A cross bill will not support affirmative relief if it is not consistent with defendant's answer to the original bill.[43]

Defendant's title or interest. The cross complaint should contain adequate averments to show title in defendant.[44] However, ordinarily it need not set forth the evidence by which cross complainant expects to prove his title[45] or the source and character of his asserted right;[46] nor need it set up title to all the property described in the original bill.[47] Nevertheless, although an action to quiet title is essentially equitable in origin and nature, as discussed supra §§ 1–6, a counterclaim to quiet title in defendant should disclose whether the title so claimed is legal or equitable,[48] and, if an equitable title is claimed, all facts which go to maintain it may be shown.[49] If an equitable interest in defendant under a contract of sale is alleged, defendant is not entitled to a judicial declaration of such interest in the absence of an allegation of facts showing the fairness of the contract and the adequacy of consideration,[50] as well as an averment of performance by defendant of conditions precedent.[51]

Possession in defendant need not be alleged,[52] since the court would have, and could properly exercise, jurisdiction of the whole controversy for the purposes of quieting the title[53] and determining the right to possession,[54] especially where there was no demurrer to the cross action for failure of the petitioner therein to allege that he is in possession.[55]

Plaintiff's adverse claim. Although it is not averred in express terms that plaintiff's claim of title is adverse to that of cross complainant, it is sufficient, on demurrer, if facts are alleged showing such to be the case.[56] Moreover, it has been held that a counterclaim to quiet defendant's title is sufficient although it is silent as to plaintiff's claim, since that is shown by plaintiff's bringing suit.[57]

c. Pleadings in Reply to Cross Pleading

Where new issues are raised by a cross pleading, the court may permit the plaintiff to plead defensive matter by reply or answer; and where an answer is required and not filed the cross bill may be taken as confessed.

Where defendant raises new issues by a cross complaint, the court may permit plaintiff to plead defensive matter by way of reply to the cross complaint,[58] or by way of answer,[59] even after submission of the case to the court.[60] Where an answer denied that the petition stated facts sufficient to divest defendant's title to land conveyed to him by a third person, and, after plaintiff had replied by a general denial, defendant filed a cross bill alleging his purchase from such person, and the trial was had as though all the issues were joined, the reply has been held properly treated as answering the cross bill.[61] Where an answer to a cross bill is required, and none is filed, it is proper to enter an order taking the cross bill as confessed,[62] provided cross complainants so request.[63] However, where a cross complaint is unnecessary, in accordance with the rule discussed supra subdivision a of this section, plaintiff's failure to answer a "cross complaint" does not authorize the entry of a default against him.[64]

What may be pleaded. Where defendant files a cross complaint, plaintiff, as cross defendant, has the right to set up any equitable defense which he has as an adverse claim as against cross complainant's suit to quiet title.[65] If a cross complaint against plaintiff and a codefendant tenders new issues, plaintiff may, by answer to the cross complaint, set up the defense that he had, before the filing of the cross complaint, acquired the title of the codefendant;[66] and where defendant seeks to foreclose a mortgage by cross bill, or counterclaim in the nature thereof, plaintiff is entitled to set up in his reply any defensive matter which could have been pleaded had defendant filed a complaint for foreclosure of the mortgage.[67]

Setting up claim for improvements. Where defendant interposes an answer in the nature of a cross action in ejectment for recovery of possession, and plaintiff in reply sets up a claim for improvements in case defendant establishes his title, the matters so set up constitute no part of plaintiff's case in chief under the complaint, but are only defensive to defendant's cross action.[68]

It is generally held that matter may be pleaded as a counterclaim in suits to quiet title if it constitutes a cause of action in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff and is germane to, or connected with, the subject of the plaintiff's action.

Counterclaims are proper in actions to quiet title;[69] and the rules and statutes governing counterclaims in civil suits generally, discussed in Pleading §§ 167-176, have been held to apply to suits to quiet title.[70] Accordingly, it is generally held that, in actions to quiet title or remove a cloud, matter may be pleaded as a counterclaim if it constitutes a cause of action in favor of defendant against plaintiff, and is germane to, or connected with, the subject of plaintiff's action;[71] and, even where such

(3) Where complaint to have a deed executed to defendant by trustee in bankruptcy of a plaintiff cotenant declared void and removed as a cloud on title of plaintiff cotenants, and for partition, did not set forth interests of defendant even in alternative, defendant as a cotenant was entitled to counterclaim for partition. Hilstad, N.D., 25 N.W.2d 687.

Counterclaims held not proper

(1) Where defendants in quiet title action prayed that title be de-

matter is set up in the answer and may be a complete defense to the cause of action alleged in the complaint, it may also be pleaded as a counterclaim [72] However, matters which do not tend to diminish or defeat plaintiff's recovery are not a proper ground for counterclaim;[73] and it has been held that defendant may not interpose a counterclaim for a mere money demand.[74]

Counterclaims in the nature of cross complaints to quiet title are discussed supra § 70, replies to counterclaims infra § 72, and the effect of the dismissal of the original bill on the counterclaim infra § 85.

§ 72. Replication or Reply and Subsequent Pleadings

Except in so far as the rule is changed by statute, the plaintiff ordinarily must respond by replication or reply to new matter properly pleaded by way of defense or counterclaim.

In accordance with rules as to the necessity of a replication or reply in civil actions generally, discussed in Pleading §§ 185–190, and in equity proceedings generally, considered in Equity § 361, and subject to some exceptions, plaintiff must, unless a reply is waived,[75] respond by replication or reply to new matter properly pleaded by way of defense[76] or counterclaim,[77] and not demurred to; and unless he does so the answer will be taken as true.[78] However, under or without reference to statutes so providing, a reply to affirmative matter in the answer is frequently unnecessary, generally on the theory that such matter is deemed to have been denied without a reply.[79] In any event, matters put in issue by the complaint and the general denial thereof in the answer are not required to be denied by a reply.[80] So an answer alleging affirmatively that defendant is the owner, and setting out the source of his title, merely makes an issue as to title, and does not require a reply,[81] nor need plaintiff reply to a counterclaim unnecessarily pleaded.[82] The failure to reply where a reply is unnecessary does not constitute an admission of an allegation in the answer.[83] Under a statute so providing, where the defense is founded on a written instrument, such as a deed, which is contained in the pleading, the genuineness and due execution of such instrument are deemed admitted unless controverted by a verified denial.[84]

Pleadings in reply to cross pleadings are considered supra § 70 c, and the use of a demurrer to attack a reply infra § 73 a

Rejoinder. Where the code does not provide for a rejoinder to a reply, an allegation of plaintiff's title pleaded for the first time in the reply is deemed to be controverted.[85]

Requisites and sufficiency. The general rules as to the requisites and sufficiency of a replication or reply, discussed in Pleading §§ 193–201, are applicable in actions to quiet title.[86] Thus the reply must not depart from the cause of action stated in creed in it, plaintiff having dismissed petition could not recover by way of counterclaim alleged unearned premiums on insurance on ground that defendants fraudulently converted them, since such alleged fraudulent conversion did not arise out of transaction set forth in answer and was not connected with subject of action, which is title to property.—Clark Real Estate Co. v. Old Trails Inv. Co., 76 S.W.2d 388, 335 Mo. 1237.

Where defendant, in action to quiet title, asserts legal title, plaintiff may, by reply, set up facts entitling him to equitable relief.—Teisinger v. Hardy, 5 P.2d 219, 91 Mont. 9.

Pleading estoppel to assert title
Since, in proceedings to quiet title, estoppel in pais to assert title is an equitable defense, it can be properly presented in reply to affirmative allegations of title in answer.—Rains v. Moulder, 90 S.W.2d 81, 338 Mo. 275.

the complaint.[87] Moreover, where in an action to determine adverse claims defendant asserts legal title, plaintiff may in his reply plead facts showing an equitable title which ought to prevail over defendant's title.[88] A reply is not insufficient because it denies on information and belief an answer setting up a recorded deed, where it also alleges facts which render the deed invalid.[89]

Admissions by reply. Rules governing admissions in replies and their construction, scope, and effect, in civil suits generally, discussed in Pleading §§ 202-205, have been applied to replies and replications in suits to quiet title.[90] Thus setting up the statute of limitations by way of reply in an action to quiet title does not admit the validity of the title to the adverse party.[91]

§ 73. Demurrer or Exception

a. In general
b. Grounds for demurrer to bill or complaint
c. Scope and effect
d. Hearing and determination

a. In General

Rules governing demurrers to pleadings in civil actions generally apply in actions to quiet title.

Rules governing demurrers or exceptions to pleadings in civil actions generally, discussed in Pleading § 211-274, and in equity proceedings generally, discussed in Equity §§ 261-300, have been applied in actions to quiet title.[92] Thus the objection that the averments of the complaint are contradictory must be taken by special demurrer rather than by general demurrer.[93] However, advantage may be taken by demurrer of all matters which go to the jurisdiction of the court, whether or not specially pointed out in the demurrer;[94] and it has been held that an objection that the bill showed only a scrambling, and not a peaceable, possession need not be taken by special demurrer, but is sufficiently raised by a general demurrer.[95] It is improper practice, where the bill gives a history of plaintiff's claim, to demur to a part and answer to part thereof; but, as a whole, it either does or does not show title, and, as a whole, should be demurred to or answered.[96]

Waiver of demurrer. Where in a suit defendant tenders a peremptory exception that there is no cause of action because defendant was not in possession, and the exception is referred to the merits without prejudice, it is not waived by an answer in which it is expressly reserved.[97]

Demurrer to answer. Rules governing demurrers generally have been applied to demurrers to answers.[98] Thus a demurrer is not available to attack an answer, where the answer raises material issues of fact requiring a trial of the action,[99] or on the ground that the allegations of the answer showed title in plaintiff and not in defendant.[1]

Demurrer to disclaimer. A disclaimer is not subject to demurrer.[2]

Demurrer to cross bill. Rules governing demurrers generally have been held to apply to demurrers to defendant's cross bill.[3]

Demurrer to reply. It is error to overrule a demurrer to a bad special paragraph of a reply, although proof of the facts therein might be admis-

Surplusage
Where cross bill contained allegations requisite for statutory bill to quiet title, it would not be demurrable because it went further and stated source of complainant's title, even though additional allegations show no title in complainant.—Floyd v. Andrews, 20 So.2d 331, 246 Ala. 301.

sible under the general denial pleaded in another paragraph thereof.[4]

b. Grounds for Demurrer to Bill or Complaint

A demurrer lies to determine whether sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action are alleged in a bill or complaint to quiet title or remove a cloud.

In accordance with rules governing the use of demurrers to bills or complaints generally, the question whether the matters alleged in a bill or complaint to quiet title or remove a cloud are sufficient to constitute a cause of action should be presented by a demurrer for that reason.[5] Thus a demurrer lies where a want of necessary parties is disclosed by the bill itself,[6] where the bill fails to allege that there is no suit pending to try title,[7] or where it does not contain an offer to do equity, where such offer is necessary.[8]

On the other hand, a demurrer will not lie as to matters alleged in a complaint which are not required to be alleged, since such allegations are mere surplusage,[9] or as to matters not disclosed on the face of the bill,[10] or as to matters as to which there is some ambiguity or uncertainty;[11] and a demurrer is not available to attack a complaint which is in the language of the statute.[12] Where the bill fails to show clearly when complainant acquired title, a special demurrer on the ground that complainant's equity is barred by the statute of limitations will be overruled.[13] A defendant cannot demur as to matters which do not affect his interests[14]

Multifariousness or misjoinder of causes of action is ground for demurrer.[15] However, plaintiff's pleadings are not demurrable because they show that there are other persons holding outstanding titles, and that making them parties would result in a multifariousness of properties and parties,[16] since it is no concern of defendant that there are other outstanding titles which might constitute a cloud[17]

Defects in form A bill which shows complainant to be entitled to relief is not demurrable because it is imperfectly drawn;[18] nor will a demurrer to the bill for want of sufficient facts reach a defect, if any exist, in the prayer for relief.[19]

Matters relating to plaintiff's title or interest. The failure of plaintiff's pleading to contain matter as to title required by statute to be alleged is a ground for a special demurrer.[20] So also, a complaint in a suit to quiet title which shows on its face that plaintiff is not the owner of the land in issue,[21] or has no interest therein whatever,[22] is subject to demurrer; and where, in addition to alleged ownership in fee, the facts which constitute the title are also set out, and such facts do not show title, a demurrer to the bill will lie.[23] Where complainant is seeking affirmative relief, based on a patent to land, defendant may attack the validity of such patent by demurrer, on the ground that it is void on its face, without first showing that he has an interest in the land.[24] A general demurrer is not available to raise the objection that, although title was once in plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint, defendant has since acquired a superior title.[25] It is not a ground for demurrer to a complaint which is essentially one to remove a cloud from title, rather than to try title, that a question of title is incidentally involved.[26]

Want of possession in plaintiff. Where possession is necessary to sustain the action, a bill which fails to allege that plaintiff is in possession of the land in controversy,[27] and that such possession is peaceable, if peaceable possession is required by statute,[28] or fails to show who is in actual possession,[29] or shows that defendant is in possession,[30] is demurrable. However, want of possession is not a good ground of demurrer to a bill by a party out of possession, claiming title to the realty as remainderman, pending possession of the life tenant.[31]

Want of proper averments as to cloud or adverse claim. A bill to remove a cloud on title is demurrable or objectionable for failure to show the existence of the cloud,[32] or to allege the facts which show the apparent validity of the alleged cloud, and also the facts showing its actual invalidity.[33] On the other hand, it has been held that a bill which shows that the grantor in a deed constituting the alleged cloud had no title or interest whatever in the land is not for that reason alone demurrable.[34]

c. Scope and Effect

General rules governing the scope and effect of demurrers to pleadings in civil actions apply in actions to quiet title.

General rules governing the scope and effect of demurrers to pleadings in civil actions, discussed in Pleading §§ 253 262, have been applied in actions to quiet title.[35] Thus, on demurrer to a complaint, the sufficiency of the pleading is to be determined by its allegations, and not by the prayer for relief;[36] and the fact that a bill contains a special prayer for relief to which plaintiff is not entitled will not render the bill demurrable.[37] Matters merely affecting the costs, and not plaintiff's right to judgment, will not be considered.[38] A demurrer to a bill for cancellation of a mortgage and notes secured thereby, because of failure to allege an offer by plaintiff to do equity, does not present the question of failure to show that plaintiff had met payments as agreed on in the contract.[39]

Admissions. A demurrer admits the truth of all facts well pleaded[40] and all inferences which reasonably may be drawn therefrom;[41] and a demurrer to a bill or petition should be overruled if the allegations state a cause of action entitling plaintiff to substantially the relief sought.[42]

51 C.J. p 231 note 84.

Demurrer to pleading good in part. A demurrer to the entire bill should be overruled if the bill shows a right to any relief.[43] Accordingly a bill will not be held bad on a general demurrer, if it is maintainable as to part of the lands described in the complaint.[44]

d. Hearing and Determination

General rules governing the hearing and determination of demurrers apply to demurrers in actions to quiet title.

General rules governing the hearing and determination as to demurrers in civil actions generally, discussed in Pleading §§ 264–268, have been applied to demurrers in actions to quiet title.[45] Thus, where a complaint consists of two counts, one to quiet title, and the other merely incidental thereto, so that only one cause of action is stated, a general demurrer will be sustained if the second count reveals a substantial defect or fails to state a cause of action.[46] Where a bill to quiet title, joined with a prayer for other relief, is held multifarious on demurrer, complainant may elect, by amendment, the aspect on which he will proceed,[47] but if the sole equity of the bill is the statutory proceeding to quiet title, and the bill is insufficient for failure to set up jurisdictional facts, a demurrer to the whole bill for want of equity must be sustained, and the cause cannot be retained for incidental relief equally obtainable at law.[48] It is error to sustain a demurrer and dismiss a bill which is readily correctible by amendment;[49] but, where plaintiff declines to amend after the sustaining of a demurrer which is both general and special, he must stand on his pleading as against both grounds of demurrer.[50]

On demurrer to a bill involving a question of boundaries, or what lands were intended to be conveyed by a certain description, which might be more or less affected by oral evidence or circumstances difficult to set forth in detail in the bill, plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of all such extrinsic evidence as might be introduced in support of his theory on the question under the case made by the bill.[51]

§ 74. Amended or Supplemental Pleadings

a. In general
b. Character of amendments

a. In General

The allowance or refusal of amendments to pleadings in actions to quiet title rests within the sound discretion of the court.

The general rules as to amended and supplementary pleadings in civil actions, discussed in Pleading §§ 275–338, and in equity proceedings, discussed in Equity §§ 390–424, apply to an action to quiet title or to remove a cloud or to determine adverse claims.[52] Pursuant to such rules the court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, allow or refuse amendments to the pleadings according to the circumstances of the particular case;[53] and it has been held that great liberality should be exercised in permitting amendments.[54] An order sustaining a demurrer to an answer and permitting an amendment has been held to be merely a direction to file an amendment, so that the original answer is not superseded,[55] and a subsequent order striking the

Pleadings held amendable

(1) In a suit to quiet title, a bill which was defective under the statute for failure to allege that the plaintiff was in possession of the property was subject to amendment. —Conway v. Wilson, 181 So. 385, 132 Fla. 404.

(2) A count in a complaint alleging a cause of action to quiet title to alleged interests in oil royalty, although it was defective in alleging plaintiffs' claims and not that they were the owners of their proportionate shares of landowners' royalty in oil and gas produced from defendant's property, was saved from being entirely defective and was amendable, where plaintiffs' titles and sources of titles were set forth in another cause of action the allegations of which were incorporated in the cause of action to quiet title.—Andrews v. amended answer restores the original pleading.[56] Immaterial allegations in an amended pleading will not detract from the proper allegations of the original pleading.[57]

Waiver of objections. Where the supplemental complaint is objectionable on the ground that the original complaint is wholly defective, the objection must be taken by demurrer or by objection to the filing of the supplemental complaint,[58] and is waived by answer.[59]

Time of amendment. Subject to statutory provisions regulating the amendment of pleadings generally, the stage of the proceedings at which amendments are allowable is ordinarily a matter of discretion.[60] Amendments unobjectionable in their character have been allowed after issue joined,[61] at the trial or hearing,[62] at the close of the evidence,[63] after submission of the cause, but before decision,[64] after the cause has been transferred to another court,[65] after judgment or decree,[66] and even after reversal on appeal.[67] However, where plaintiff could have pleaded certain matter in his original pleading, but waited until judgment went against him before seeking to amend to include such matter, the court may properly refuse to permit such amendment.[68] Similarly, an amendment to an answer may be properly refused where there is excessive delay in moving to amend, and no satisfactory excuse for the delay, and allowance of the amendment would interfere with a prompt trial of the case in a manner fair to all parties.[69]

Ordinarily defendant cannot, after plaintiff has moved to dismiss and his motion has been called to the attention of the court, file an amended answer seeking affirmative relief.[70]

b. Character of Amendments

Necessary and material amendments in furtherance of justice are allowable as long as the subject of the action remains substantially the same and no new and distinct cause of action or claim of defense is set up.

Generally speaking, necessary and material amendments in furtherance of justice are allowable as long as the subject of the action remains substantially the same and no new and distinct cause of action or claim of defense is set up,[71] even though the amendment may change the form of remedy;[72] and it has been held that the court should not be astute to detect a departure.[73] Thus a bill, originally filed as a bill to quiet title strictly under the statute, may be amended by adding averments seeking to remove a cloud on title;[74] and, on the other hand, a bill to remove a cloud may be converted into a bill under the statute to compel the determination of adverse claims and to quiet title.[75] Similarly, in an action to remove a cloud from title, defendant may be permitted to amend his answer so as to set up his title.[76] However, a new and different cause of action may not be substituted for the

Plaintiff's peaceable possession

An amended bill to cancel deed and remove it as cloud on plaintiff's title to land did not detract from general allegation of original bill to quiet title that plaintiff was in peaceable possession of land by averring past acts of defendant and his predecessors in title which indicated possible interference with plaintiff's previous peaceable possession, since the criterion is peaceable possession when suit is instituted.—Davidson v. original by amendment or be brought in by a new and separate count;[77] nor may a petition be amended so as to include a new count where the relief sought therein is premature.[78] In some instances the court may require the amending of a pleading for the purpose of making it more certain.[79]

Description of property. A mistake in the description of the property may be corrected by amendment;[80] and an amendment enlarging the description of the land may not be objected to as prejudicial to a defendant who disclaims as to all the premises described in the amended complaint.[81] However, an amendment substituting property different from that described in the original pleading is not allowable.[82] Notwithstanding an accurate plat is attached to a pleading, the court may require the pleading to be amended so as to contain a description by metes and bounds.[83]

Facts arising after commencement of the action which, if true, would defeat the action, may be pleaded by supplemental answer, at least under the code procedure which abolishes useless forms.[84] So, if at the commencement of the action plaintiff had the equitable title, a supplemental complaint may be filed setting up that plaintiff has since acquired the legal title;[85] and it has been held that, as against one who for his own benefit comes into a pending action to quiet title, plaintiff may, by supplemental complaint, avail himself of a title by adverse possession which became complete after he brought the action but before the intervention.[86] On the other hand, it has been held that, if plaintiff had no title whatever at the commencement of the action, he will not be permitted to file a supplemental complaint showing an after-acquired title.[87] Similarly, if an original bill to remove a cloud from title is filed when complainant is not in possession, so that the bill is objectionable for failure to allege possession, as discussed supra § 60, the court may refuse leave to file a supplemental bill alleging possession subsequently obtained.[88]

Amendments to conform to proof. In accordance with general rules of pleading, the court may, in a proper case, authorize amendments of the pleadings to conform to the proofs,[89] or treat the pleading as so amended.[90] Evidence admitted without objection will not effect an amendment of a pleading so as to embrace subject matters of causes of action not therein mentioned.[91]

§ 75. Issues, Proof, and Variance

b. Matters which must be proved

d. Variance between allegations and proof

a. In General

The issues in an action to quiet title or remove a cloud are issues of law and issues of fact; and the issues of fact which arise are those, and only those, which are properly presented by the pleading.

In accordance with rules governing issues, proof, and variance in civil actions generally, discussed in Pleading §§ 512–546, and in equity proceedings generally, discussed in Equity §§ 438–446, the issues in an action to quiet title or remove a cloud are issues of law,[92] and issues of fact.[93] The issues of fact which arise for determination in a suit to quiet title are those, and only those, which are properly presented by the pleadings.[94] On the other hand, a denial that the realty in controversy is plaintiff's homestead, and that the sale thereof made under defendant's judgment, which is a pure money judgment, is void or a cloud on title, raises an issue of law, and not of fact.[95] So also, where the complaint states plaintiff's ownership and defendant's claim, setting out facts showing the nature and extent of the latter's title, and the answer admits the allegations of the complaint, issues of law determinative of the conflicting claims are raised;[96] but no such issue of law arises where the complaint merely alleges that defendant claims some interest, without setting out its nature and extent, and the answer merely admits such allegations.[97]

Title and adverse claim. The rule confining the issues of fact to those presented by the pleadings is applicable to the issue of title to the property involved.[98] A general denial is sufficient to put plaintiff's title in issue in an action to determine adverse claims.[99] So a general denial and special plea asserting title in defendant put the whole title in issue.[1] Where the complaint alleges that defendant claims some estate or interest in the land adverse to plaintiff, but that his claim is without right, and that he has no right, title, or interest therein, and the answer admits the former, and denies the latter, allegation, such answer raises a material issue of fact;[2] and where the petition alleges that defendant was not an innocent purchaser, a general denial puts such allegation in issue.[3] Where defendant denies plaintiff's ownership and alleges title in himself, and also sets up the same title by counterclaim, praying that it be quieted, a voluntary dismissal of the counterclaim does not expunge allegations of defendant's ownership in the answer proper, but leaves the issue of fact intact.[4]

Possession. The rule confining issues of fact to those presented by the pleadings applies to the issue of possession of property.[5] As considered supra § 67 b, a denial of plaintiff's possession raises a material issue; but an issue as to such possession is immaterial where the action is brought under a statute dispensing with possession as a condition precedent to the maintenance of the action.[6]

Fraud and forgery. The rule that the issues must be raised by the pleadings applies to fraud as an issue.[7] If it is alleged that defendant holds a deed to the property which is a fraud and a forgery, and a cloud on plaintiff's title, and, unless canceled, will operate as an irreparable injury to plaintiff, the only issues tendered to be considered on the trial are the questions as to forgery and fraud;[8] but where the answer alleges that a deed made by plaintiff's vendor was without consideration, and to hinder, delay, and defraud a certain creditor of vendor, which allegation is denied, no issue is raised as to whether the deed was made to delay or defraud the creditors of the vendor generally.[9]

b. Matters Which Must Be Proved

(1) In general
(2) Title or interest
(3) Possession of land

(1) In General

All matters which are material or essential to a cause of action or defense in actions to quiet title or remove a cloud must be proved; but nonessential matters are not required to be proved even though alleged.

In actions to quiet title or to remove a cloud all matters which are material or essential to a cause of action or a defense must not only be alleged in the pleadings, as discussed supra §§ 58–74, but must be proved.[10] Nonessential matters are not required to be proved even though they may be alleged in the pleadings,[11] as where plaintiff's reply contains a denial of allegations in the answer which are essentially defensive;[12] but incidental relief dependent on such matters cannot be granted where such matters are not proved.[13]

Defendant's adverse claim. Where defendant pleads an adverse claim he must prove it.[14]

Improvements by defendant. Under the betterment statutes it has been held that defendant must prove his allegations as to improvements on the land even though plaintiff makes no formal denial of such allegations.[15]

Truth of recitals in instrument constituting cloud. Where plaintiff alleges that defendant makes an adverse claim of title under a certain deed which he offers in evidence, he is not bound to show that the recitals in the deed are untrue before he can recover.[16]

(2) Title or Interest

The plaintiff is required to prove legal or equitable title in himself, or some interest superior to that of the defendant, unless such matter is not put in issue; but ordinarily immaterial allegations as to title need not be proved.

It has been held necessary, as a jurisdictional prerequisite, that complainant show himself to be the true owner of the legal title.[17] Where plaintiff's title is put in issue by the answer he must prove the legal or equitable title in himself,[18] or at least that he has some interest in the land in controversy superior to that of defendant.[19] If, however, plaintiff's title is not put in issue he is not required to prove title.[20] Thus, if the chain of title is specifically set forth in the bill, and not specifically denied, evidence thereof need not be produced.[21] So also, where defendant claims title through plaintiff, the latter need not prove his title;[22] and, where both parties claim title from a common source, it is not

Plaintiff as bona fide purchaser

Plaintiff was not required to prove that he was a bona fide purchaser of lot involved, where question of plaintiff's bona fides was injected as affirmative defense by allegations of answer which were denied in plaintiff's reply, and, hence, it was not incumbent on plaintiff to introduce evidence to refute allegations until defendants had introduced some evidence in support of allegations.—McGrath v. necessary for plaintiff to prove title in the common grantor,[23] but only that the title of such grantor passed to him.[24] Similarly, it is not necessary for defendant to prove title in his grantor where the grantor's former ownership is alleged in the complaint and not denied in the answer.[25] Where defendant alleges title in himself and asks to have it quieted, he waives the question of possession in plaintiff, as considered supra § 31, but plaintiff must still prove his title.[26]

Immaterial allegations in respect of plaintiff's title ordinarily need not be proved.[27] Thus, where the statute under which the action is brought was intended to enable a party to quiet his title by proof of actual peaceable possession with claim of title, the fact that plaintiff's title in fee is alleged in the complaint and denied in the answer does not render it necessary for plaintiff to prove title in himself.[28] On the other hand it has been held that, where plaintiff unnecessarily alleges ownership, he must prove it, if it is denied by the answer.[29]

Admissions. Where the answer admits title in plaintiff, no proof of title is necessary.[30] Under a statute providing that when an action or defense is founded on a written instrument, a copy of which is contained in the pleading, the genuineness and due execution of such instrument are deemed admitted unless an affidavit denying such facts is filed within a prescribed period, in the absence of such controverting affidavit the instrument is not required to be put in evidence.[31] The admissions of an infant defendant, however, may not be taken against him, but plaintiff is required to prove title in himself with the same certainty as would be required of him had an answer been filed denying positively the allegation of title;[32] and a fortiori an admission in the answer of a codefendant that title is in plaintiff cannot bind the infant, although the interest of himself and his codefendant is joint.[33]

(3) Possession of Land

Where possession is necessary to maintenance of the action, the plaintiff must prove his possession of the land, unless an allegation of possession is not denied; and where an allegation that land is vacant and unoccupied is material it must be proved.

If possession is necessary to the maintenance of the action, in accordance with the rules discussed supra §§ 26-31, plaintiff cannot prevail without proof of such possession,[34] where the allegation of possession is denied in the answer,[35] although he need not prove possession of all of the land, since he may succeed as to a part and fail as to the remainder.[36] However, where plaintiff's allegation of possession is not denied[37] or is not essential under the circumstances,[38] proof thereof is unnecessary. So, where plaintiff deraigns a good title, and defendant shows no title, plaintiff need not prove his possession, although his allegation thereof is not denied by defendant.[39] Where possession in plaintiff is not necessary to the maintenance of the action, his allegation of possession is superfluous and need not be proved.[40]

Vacant and unoccupied land. In an action by one not in possession to quiet title to lands alleged to be vacant and unoccupied, such allegation, being material, must be proved in order to entitle plaintiff to recover.[41] Where, under the circumstances, such allegation is unnecessary, such matter need not be proved.[42] Thus, if defendant, in the ordinary statutory action to determine adverse claims, alleges title in himself, and demands affirmative relief against plaintiff, it is not necessary for plaintiff to prove the allegation that the land is vacant and unoccupied,[43] or that he is in possession,[44] as the case may be; and, where an allegation in the answer that the land was vacant and unoccupied is not denied by the reply, it stands admitted, and need not be proved.[45]

c. Evidence Admissible under Pleadings

In general, the proof in actions to quiet title or remove clouds must be confined to the issues, and evidence will be admitted when, and only when, it conforms to the pleadings.

In accordance with the general rules governing the admissibility of evidence under the pleadings in civil actions, discussed in Pleading §§ 524–530, and in equity proceedings, discussed in Equity § 444, the proof in actions to quiet title or remove clouds must be confined to the issues, and hence evidence will be admitted when, and only when, it conforms to the matters alleged in the bill or answer.[46] However, it has been held in some jurisdictions, that defendant may, under general denial, give in evidence all defenses, either legal or equitable.[47]

Title. The rule confining the proof to the issues made by the pleadings applies to proof of title to the property in issue.[48] Thus, where the nature or source of plaintiff's title is specifically set out, evidence of a different title or title from another source cannot be proved.[49] However, under a general allegation of title, plaintiff may prove title by adverse possession,[50] or whatever title he has,[51] from whatever source he may have acquired it and by any species of conveyances recognized by law;[52] and an allegation of title by adverse possession has been held not to preclude evidence of record title and possession.[53] Moreover, the fact that plaintiff pleads ownership only, and not possession, does not prevent him from proving possession in order to show ownership.[54]

with a title, which, by his answer, he sets up in himself;[57] and where he pleads a fee simple title in himself, he is restricted to proof of such title,[58] and cannot prove an equitable title or interest.[59] Where the complaint alleges that plaintiff is the owner and that defendant claims an adverse estate, calling on him to set forth the nature of his claim, defendant is not confined to proof of a particular claim, but may set forth any adverse title on which he relies.[60] Where plaintiff alleges defendant's adverse claim of title and defendant admits the claim adverse to plaintiff and asserts ownership in himself, defendant may introduce evidence attacking plaintiff's title;[61] and he may controvert a prima facie showing by plaintiff either by evidence showing that plaintiff does not have title[62] or that defendant himself is the owner.[63] In jurisdictions where no pleadings are allowed beyond a demurrer to the reply, if plaintiff's title is pleaded for the first time in reply, defendant may, without further pleading, introduce evidence attacking the validity of such title.[64]

Void conveyance; fraud. In accordance with the rule confining the evidence to the issues made by the pleadings, evidence attacking the validity of a conveyance,[65] such as evidence of undue influence,[66] or want of consideration,[67] is not admissible unless pleaded. Thus, where plaintiff sets up a conveyance as a basis for title, defendant cannot show that the conveyance was fraudulent,[68] unless he has pleaded fraud;[69] nor can fraud be proved by plaintiff where no fraud was charged in plaintiff's pleadings.[70] Moreover, where defendant alleges fraud he is limited to evidence as to actual fraud or oppression.[71] However, under an exception, which prevails in certain special circumstances,[72] it has been held that defendant is not bound to anticipate the source of plaintiff's title,[73] and may prove, without specifically pleading the fact, that it depends on a void or fraudulent conveyance.[74] Moreover, where defendant sets up a deed or other muniment of title under which he claims, plaintiff may, in jurisdictions where no replication is required or permitted, show that the instrument was procured by fraud, although he did not plead fraud in his complaint,[75] or may present whatever defense he has to the new matter so alleged by defendant;[76] and where plaintiff alleges ownership, and defendant denies the allegation in general terms and introduces a decree on which his claim is based, without pleading such decree, plaintiff may, under the implied replication which the law raises, prove that such decree was invalid for fraud and want of jurisdiction.[77] Where by statute the genuineness and due execution of an instrument, such as a deed, which is set out in a pleading are deemed admitted where not controverted by a verified denial, as discussed supra subdivision b (2) of this section, and while evidence is inadmissible to establish a defense relating to the genuineness and due execution of the instrument,[78] evidence is admissible to show that the deed had been stolen or procured by fraud or to establish any other defense against it.[79]

Bona fide purchase. Where the statute only requires complainant to allege peaceable possession and ownership in general terms, such general averments are sufficient to allow proof of every fact necessary to establish in him a legal title superior to that asserted by defendant, including the fact that complainant or those under whom he claims were purchasers without notice.[80] On the other hand, where the statute requires specific avowal in the answer of the extent, character, and source of defendant's title, defendant cannot prove that one through whom he claims was an innocent purchaser without notice, where he did not so plead.[81]

d. Variance between Allegations and Proof

Averments and proofs in actions to quiet title or remove clouds should substantially correspond, and a material variance is fatal.

In accordance with the general rules governing such matters in civil actions, discussed in Pleading §§ 531–546, and in equity proceedings, discussed in Equity §§ 445, 446, the averments and proofs in actions to quiet title or remove a cloud should substantially correspond, and a material variance is fatal.[82] A variance between an allegation and proof which might have been obviated on the trial by other evidence or amendment if it had been expressly objected to on that ground will be deemed waived, and will be disregarded.[83]

As to title. Proof of the nature and source of plaintiff's title must not vary materially from the averments of the bill or complaint.[84] An averment of ownership in fee is not supported by proof of an equitable title,[85] although under some statutes the variance is immaterial.[86] So also, a specific plea of record title is not supported by proof of adverse possession.[87] A defense, consisting merely of a denial of plaintiff's title and an assertion of title in defendant, is not established by proof that, while plaintiff is the owner of the legal title, defendant has an equity entitling him to a conveyance.[88]

As to possession. An averment of possession in plaintiff is sustained by proof of possession in plaintiff's tenant at the time of bringing suit;[89] but proof showing property to be vacant constitutes a fatal variance.[90] An allegation that the land was vacant and unoccupied at the time of the filing of the bill is not sustained by proof that the land was vacant and unoccupied at a given time after the filing of the bill.[91]

76. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

a. Presumptions
b. Burden of proof in general
c Burden of going forward with evidence

a. Presumptions

The general rules as to presumptions are applicable actions to quiet title, and, accordingly, presumptions ppropriate to the circumstances of the particular case ill be indulged as to title, possession, and other atters.

The general rules as to presumptions have been plied in actions to quiet title.[92] Every presumpon will be made in favor of the holder of the gal title,[93] and proof of title raises a presumption possession or right of possession.[94] It will be esumed that a quitclaim deed given by a mortgagee, sting a cloud on the mortgage, and not intended a release, was an injury to the mortgagee.[95] order to quiet title after a lapse of more than enty years, presumptions will be made against c known facts of the case, and in favor of one possession in good faith.[96]

Continuance of possession or title. Where plaintiff's possession of the premises is shown, its continuance for a requisite time will be inferred in the absence of evidence to the contrary,[97] and a similar rule applies to defendant in possession claiming adversely.[98] So, where plaintiff shows a complete title in himself, that condition is presumed to exist until the contrary is shown.[99]

b. Burden of Proof in General

(a) In General

In an action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon, the plaintiff has the burden of proving the facts alleged on which his right to judgment is based.

Land claimed as accretion
(1) The rule that plaintiff in an action to quiet title has burden of proof is not changed by reason of restraining defendant from taking possession and interfering with plaintiff's title, the burden is on him to show his right to such relief.[2]

(b) As to Title

The burden is on the plaintiff to establish that he has a perfect legal or equitable title regardless of whether the defendant's title is valid or invalid, and, when properly in issue under the pleadings, the plaintiff has the burden of showing that his title or right is superior to that of the defendant.

Since, as discussed supra § 17, plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of his adversary's, the burden is on plaintiff to establish that he himself has a perfect legal or equitable title,[3] regardless of whether defendant's title is valid or invalid;[4] and, when properly in issue under the pleadings, plaintiff has the burden of showing that his title or right is superior to that of defendant.[5] Where the complaint alleges fact that plaintiff is claiming title to an accretion—Lake Front-East Fifty-Fifth Street Corp v. City of Cleveland, 7 Ohio Supp. 17, affirmed, App., 36 N.E.2d 196, appeal dismissed 38 N.E.2d 410, 139 Ohio St. 138.

(2) In an action to determine title to land claimed as accretion, the burden of establishing the elements of accretion is on plaintiff.

Tax lien

Landowners suing to cancel, as illegal cloud on title, New York City's tax lien on land which, by statute, was transferred outside New York City after assessment, had burden of proving that land was not in New York City when tax was assessed.—Leary v. City of New York, 7 N.E.2d 256, 273 N.Y. 342.

Unrecorded deed

In suit to quiet title it is on plaintiff claiming under an unrecorded deed to show any matters which avoid the effect of a previously recorded deed.—Kelsey v. Norris, 125 P. 111, 53 Colo. 396.

Although defendant files counterclaim alleging ownership and asking that his title be quieted, plaintiff still has burden of proving his title.—Madden v. Bond, 106 S.W.2d 95, 269 Ky. 31.

Title deducible from commonwealth, common source, or adverse possession

(1) Ordinarily, it is incumbent on a plaintiff in action to quiet title to prove, if denied, a record title back to the commonwealth, or to a source common to both litigants, or a title by adverse possession.—Dotson v. Horn, 147 S.W.2d 400, 285 Ky. 246—Hatton v. Williams' Ex'r, 82 S.W.2d 774, 259 Ky 548.

(2) So, where defendant filed counterclaim to quiet title, plaintiff and defendant having claimed title through different sources, both plaintiff and defendant were required to prove title deducible from commonwealth or by adverse possession.—Madden v. Bond, 106 S.W.2d 95, 269 Ky. 31.

(3) In action to remove cloud from title, where evidence showed that plaintiff owned land described in his petition, and that defendant was claiming land and had committed a trespass by felling trees, it was not necessary for plaintiff to show that he deraigned title from sovereignty of soil or from common source.—Lee v. Grupe, Tex.Civ.App., 223 S.W.2d 548.

Purchaser at judicial sale

One buying land at sale by master commissioner in divorce suit with knowledge of claim of another whose deed had been recorded nearly two years had burden to establish that she had equity anterior to other claimant's.—Brewer v. Lee, 68 S.W. 2d 409, 252 Ky. 798.

No necessity to attack defendant's title

In statutory suit to establish title to realty, it was not necessary for plaintiffs to attack defendants' chain of title or any link therein, and defendants' title would not be at issue until plaintiffs prove an apparently valid title in themselves.—Dugas v. Powell, 1 So.2d 677, 197 La. 409.

ossession of vacant lands, such possession must ecessarily be constructive, and plaintiff must prove itle in himself.[6] On the principle that a status, once stablished, is presumed by law to remain until he contrary appears, however, plaintiff, after proof f title in himself, need not show that he has not arted with it.[7]

Common source of title. Where both parties rely n the same source of title, plaintiff is not required o prove the whole chain of title,[8] and is not required o prove title in his grantor[9] or title beyond the ommon grantor,[10] but he must show that he has equired title or an interest from the common gran-or.[11] Where both parties derive title from a com-ion source, the burden is placed on the party having ie inferior title from the common source, if he elies on title from another independent source, to rove that the title acquired from the independent ource is paramount to the title in the common ource,[12] and he is not relieved of this burden by ie fact that the deed tending to show title from independent source was introduced in evidence r the party having the better title from the common source.[13]

Where one tenant in common unites with another, asking that the common title be quieted, he assumes the burden of proving title in his cotenant,[14] and, hence, cannot recover if the cotenant is not entitled to recover.[15]

(c) As to Possession

The burden rests with the plaintiff to prove possession on his part where possession is necessary to the maintenance of the action.

Where possession is necessary to the maintenance of the action, the burden rests with plaintiff to prove possession on his part,[16] and he is not relieved from the burden of proving it by the fact that the allegation of possession in the complaint is not denied by the answer.[17] Where both parties claim title from a common source, possession of plaintiff or his later predecessors need not be proved, however;[18] and, where defendant files a counterclaim asserting title to the land and asks that his title be quieted, he waives the requirement that possession be proved.[19]

Asking for affirmative relief as

Where plaintiff alleges that land is vacant and unoccupied, the burden is on him to prove that fact,[20] and in a suit brought under a statute providing for the establishment of title where none of the parties is in actual possession, plaintiff must prove that neither party is in actual possession.[21]

(d) As to Adverse Claim

The burden is on the plaintiff to show the assertion of an adverse claim by the defendant constituting a cloud on title, and the invalidity of such claim.

Plaintiff must in the first instance show the assertion of an adverse claim by defendant,[22] and prove his allegations that such claim is invalid[23] and a cloud on title.[24]

(2) On Defendant

Where the defendant substantially asserts and relies on a fact as an affirmative issue, the burden is on him to establish it.

Where defendant substantially asserts and relies on a fact as an affirmative issue, he must establish it,[25] unless it is established by the evidence offered by plaintiff.[26] Where defendant admits the fee to be in plaintiff from whom he deraigns his title, but claims that plaintiff's title has since been defeated, the burden is on him in the first instance to establish his title.[27] So the burden of a particular issue may rest with defendant, even if plaintiff is required to prove his whole case.[28] Where plaintiff is in peaceable possession and no suit is pending to test defendant's title, plaintiff is not required to prove title, but the burden of proof is on defendant.[29]

c. Burden of Going Forward with Evidence

Where the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, the burden of going forward with the evidence, as distinguished from the burden of proof, shifts to the defendant; and, where the defendant has established the due execution of an instrument under which he claims, the burden is again cast on the plaintiff to show facts in avoidance, and, if he does so, the burden of going forward with the evidence returns to the defendant.

When plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, the burden of going forward with the evidence will be shifted to defendant;[30] and it is necessary only for plaintiff to make out a prima facie case in order put defendant on his proof,[31] but the burden of proof which rests upon plaintiff when the allegations of the petition are denied does not shift.[32] If defendant has established the due execution of an instrument under which he claims, the burden is then cast on plaintiff to show facts in avoidance,[33] and, if he does so, the burden of going forward with the evidence returns to defendant.[34] Where plaintiff has established a transfer from a person before he became a debtor, defendant, a subsequent judgment creditor of the grantor holding a sheriff's deed to the land executed after the first conveyance was recorded, has a much greater burden of proof than he would have had if his claim had been in existence at the time the transfer was made.[35] or incompetent extrinsic evidence relating to title is inadmissible.[38] Evidence is admissible on behalf of plaintiff to show that a deed in defendant's chain of title was invalid because of want of capacity or power to make it;[39] and in a purchaser's action to quiet title wherein the purchaser alleged the existence of an uncertainty as to the ability and capacity of the vendor to convey, the class of proof admissible is governed by the legal status of the party whose competency is in question, that is, whether he has ever been committed or declared incompetent, and, if so, whether by a summary proceeding, or by a regular adjudication of insanity.[40] Where plaintiff claims title by prescription, it is proper to show the assessment of the premises, so that the court may determine whether plaintiff has paid the taxes required by statute to obtain title by prescription.[41]

Documentary evidence. Subject to the general rules relating to documentary evidence which are discussed in Evidence §§ 623-775, relevant and material documents and writings,[42] such as grants or deeds,[43] including deeds acquired pendente lite,[44] are admissible on the issue of title, as are mortgages,[45] contracts of sale,[46] wills,[47] and judgments and other records.[48] Assignments to plaintiff of mortgages on the property are not relevant to the issue of ownership.[49] The fact that plaintiff had put in evidence a deed purporting to have been executed by defendant will not preclude the latter from objecting to the introduction of an inadmissible document, merely because it purports to have been made by a grantee of defendant's grantee.[50]

Execution of lease. Possession in plaintiff may be shown by a lease whereby the person occupying the land holds under him.[52]

Payment of taxes. Evidence that taxes on the land in controversy are paid by a person in connection with evidence of actual possession is admissible to show the character[53] and extent[54] of his possession.

Inclosure of land. The inclosing of uncultivated, although not wild, land, on three sides by a wire fence, and on the other side by a stone fence, is evidence of possession.[55] Evidence that defendant attempted to gain possession, after the action was commenced, by inclosing the land with a fence, is evidence that he did not actually have possession.[56]

§ 80. Weight and Sufficiency

The general rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence are applicable in determining the sufficiency of the evidence in proceedings to quiet title or remove clouds thereon; and generally, in order for plaintiff to recover, it is incumbent on him to make out his case by the preponderance of the evidence.

tiff may recover, it is incumbent on him to make out his case by the preponderance of the evidence.[58] Where fraud is alleged, the evidence must be clear and convincing;[59] but, where defendant relies on a deed which plaintiffs claim was executed in violation of a power of attorney, without consideration and in fraud of the principal, only slight proof is required of plaintiffs who have the negative position.[60] Where subsequent acts are relied on as a waiver of clearly established fraud, the acts evincing a purpose to waive or forgive the fraud must be established by the clearest evidence.[61] A litigant's claim of an oral agreement for the purchase of realty prior to the death of the owner should, in actions to quiet title thereto, be scrutinized with the greatest care,[62] and established only on the most satisfactory evidence.[63]

title in himself by a preponderance of evidence.[67] Accordingly, satisfactory[68] and affirmative[69] proof of title should be adduced. Proof of title need not, however, be made with the strictness required in actions of ejectment[70] or for reformation of instruments.[71] On the other hand, it has been held that plaintiff must establish his title with clearness, accuracy, and certainty,[72] or conclusively;[73] and this applies particularly where plaintiff seeks to overcome the presumption arising from defendant's possession of the legal title.[74] So where defendants' claim of title is predicated on adverse possession, it has been said to be incumbent on them to show clearly and conclusively that all of the requirements to perfect a title by adverse possession have been met before a decree quieting title on such a ground can be entered.[75] Under some rules of court where plaintiff has proved title to the land and a cloud thereon, defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence, as an independent ground of defense, the facts allegedly giving him an equitable title.[76]

Lost instruments. Where plaintiff relies on a lost deed, he must establish its original existence, its loss, and the material parts thereof, by clear and convincing evidence,[77] and where an assault on a record title is made by attempting to establish a title in a third person by secondary evidence of a lost muniment of title, a high degree of proof is required.[78]

An ancient record copy of an ancient original deed, not executed and acknowledged as required by statute, is not sufficient to establish title without some confirming circumstances.[79]

Invalidity of adverse claim and cloud on title. Plaintiff's proofs must clearly show that the claim set up by defendant is invalid,[80] and that it constitutes a cloud on plaintiff's title.[81]

Mere paper chain of title does not establish ownership in one seeking to quiet his title unless his possession or that of his predecessors in title is shown, although title satisfactorily established may draw with it possession in absence of evidence to the contrary.—Ments v. Town of Greenwich, 171 A. 10, 118 Conn. 137.

Evidence held not conclusive

In action to quiet title to triangular parcel of realty at dividing line between tracts, testimony of competent engineer, produced by defendant, pursuant to survey made, was held not conclusive.—Merrill v. Hooper, 13 P.2d 786, 125 Cal.App. 80.

Evidence regarded with suspicion

Where the owner of property participates in a series of legal transactions with respect thereto, over a period of years and consistently deals with the property as his own, and the person who claims title to the property after the death of the owner followed a line of conduct during the life of the owner inconsistent with the ownership in himself, the court will accept with caution and regard with suspicion any evidence introduced in support of his claim of ownership, where the validity of the instrument under which he claims title is seriously questioned and was not produced until after the owner's death.—Schueler v. Prima facie evidence. It is sufficient prima facie if plaintiff makes out a title apparently good as against defendant,[82] and if defendant fails to sustain the burden of overcoming such proof plaintiff is entitled to judgment,[83] but prima facie evidence is not conclusive evidence.[84] Proof of actual possession under a claim of ownership makes out a prima facie case[85] as against a stranger to the title,[86] and, unless successfully controverted, is sufficient to justify a decree quieting title in plaintiff.[87] Mere occupancy, without other evidence of ownership, however, does not constitute adequate evidence of ownership unless such occupancy shall have ripened into title by prescription;[88] and mere possession is not sufficient as against an admitted prior title in fact.[89] A grantee under a deed from the trustee of a bankrupt corporation cannot assert that the bankrupt's possession was prima facie evidence of title in it.[90]

§ 82. —— As to Possession

The rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence in civil actions generally have been applied to evidence of possession of the premises necessary to maintain an action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon.

In order to establish a prima facie case, in absence of evidence of either possession by plaintiff or his predecessors of realty involved in action to quiet title, or a deed to plaintiff from one under whom defendant claims, duly signed, acknowledged, and recorded, together with proof that plaintiff purchased and paid for realty, or a sheriff's deed under foreclosure of a mortgage, and evidence of possession under deed, plaintiff must introduce evidence of a patent from the government and mesne transfers to himself, or of a certificate of purchase from a governmental authority.—Alspach v. relies on an adverse right depending entirely on the location of the description, the proof of possession is not required to be as strong as where there is a defense distinctly set up and relied on.[92] The payment of taxes on land is not of itself evidence of possession,[93] but paying taxes and assessments, selling a portion of the land, and subdividing the residue are sufficient prima facie evidence of possession.[94]

F. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT BEFORE HEARING

§ 83. Voluntary

In the absence of a demand by the defendant for affirmative relief which might be prejudiced by dismissal, the plaintiff ordinarily has a right to dismiss his action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon, and may, under some circumstances, dismiss as to one or more of the defendants and proceed against the others

Plaintiff ordinarily has a right to dismiss his action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon,[95] and may, under some circumstances, dismiss as to one or more of the defendants and proceed against the others to final decree.[96] So, where a petition in intervention is permitted to be filed, plaintiff may dismiss as to a defendant who seeks no affirmative relief,[97] and also as to the intervener who merely asks that plaintiff take nothing;[98] but if plaintiff does not elect to do this he has no right to dismiss as to the intervener and then proceed against defendants without meeting the issues raised by the petition in intervention.[99] Where a motion by trustees of a defunct corporation defendant, which had filed a counterclaim, to be substituted as parties is pending, plaintiffs are not entitled to dismiss as to the corporation and leave intact an erroneous judgment previously entered against the individual defendants.[1]

Demand by defendant for affirmative relief. Where defendant files a cross bill, or otherwise seeks affirmative relief, plaintiff will be precluded from dismissing his action so as to defeat or prejudice defendant's claim;[2] and if, before plaintiff attempts to dismiss his bill, defendant files a cross complaint for affirmative relief and this is answered by plaintiff and issues joined thereon, defendant is entitled to have the issues tried and disposed of.[3]

§ 84. Involuntary

In an action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon, a judgment of dismissal or nonsuit may be granted against the plaintiff in a proper case, as where the court has no jurisdiction or the action is prematurely brought or is barred by laches, but if the bill contains equity the motion to dismiss should be overruled or denied.

In an action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon, a judgment of dismissal or nonsuit may be granted against plaintiff in a proper case.[4] Thus the action may be dismissed for want of jurisdic-

(6) To support presumption of continuity of actual possession of land by respondent's predecessor in title.—Sisson v. Swift, 9 So.2d 891, 243 Ala. 289.

(7) To support finding that use by plaintiffs was not permissive and was adverse.—O'Banion v. Borba, 195 P.2d 10, 32 Cal.2d 145.

Evidence held insufficient

(1) To show scrambling possession so as to defeat right of complainant to maintain suit to quiet title.—Ellis v. Womack, 23 So.2d 359, 247 Ala. 254.

(2) To establish that tenant in possession was the tenant of the plaintiff or his grantor so as to give plaintiff such possession as to entitle him to maintain action to quiet title.—Magnolia Petroleum Co. v. Ball, Okl., 223 P.2d 136.

Title as drawing possession with it

While title to particular tract of land, in absence of evidence to contrary, draws possession with it, general possession of tract will not avail with respect to particular piece of land, unless it is satisfactorily shown to have been part of that tract.—Pepe v. Aceto, 175 A. 775, 119 Conn. 282.

Want of equity

In suit by testator's grandchildren against purchasers of testator's realty who concededly had title but for alleged will, complaint was properly dismissed for want of equity where order of a court of another state admitting alleged will to probate had been procured through fraud.—Dodd

tion,[5] or because such action is prematurely brought,[6] or is barred by laches;[7] and in the latter case it is error to dismiss "without prejudice to further suit."[8] So a cross petition may be dismissed where all the parties necessary to the determination of the question raised thereby are not before the court[9] or where the sole issue of title raised by it has been disposed of by the verdict on other counts in the petition.[10] A counterclaim is properly dismissed where the matters set forth therein go to the equities of the subject matter presented by plaintiff's bill, and a final decree on the bill and an appropriate answer would determine the equities between the parties if all material matters set forth in the cross complaint were properly pleaded in an answer.[11]

If the bill of complaint contains equity, the motion to dismiss should be overruled or denied.[12] Where plaintiff brings an action under the statute to quiet title as against defendant's assertion of a judgment lien on plaintiff's homestead, plaintiff is entitled to have the cause tried on its merits, and a dismissal of the complaint is erroneous.[13] The fact that defendant claims no interest in the property is not ground for dismissal as to him where he does not file a disclaimer, but answers, denying plaintiff's ownership and right of possession,[14] especially where defendant's husband claims a life interest in the land constituting community property in which the wife had a present vested interest equal to that of her husband.[15] Also an action will not be dismissed because a municipality, one of the defendants, has instituted an action against others involving a portion of the land claimed by plaintiff, part of which is used as a public street.[16] So, where a person is made defendant by amendment to the petition, failure to make him an original defendant is no ground for nonsuit.[17] A bill which is defective for failure to allege possession of plaintiff is not dismissible on that ground, the bill being subject to amendment,[18] but a bill which after repeated amendments remains defective for want of an essential averment is properly dismissed.[19] Defendant's claim of title by payment of taxes for the statutory period is an affirmative defense which will preclude him from having the action dismissed.[20] Where a bill based on a contract of sale is dismissed because of the existence of other adequate remedies, but prior to the filing of the action defendant brought suit against plaintiff to recover the purchase money, defendant's counterclaim should also be dismissed, or be discontinued until the issue in the prior suit is determined.[21] The court should not dismiss, without prejudice to either party to further action, a petition to quiet title and a cross petition seeking the same relief where the subject matter of both pleadings was within the jurisdiction of the court when the parties tendered their cause for decision.[22]

Granting motion to dismiss held error

In action to quiet title to tract of land and remove as cloud on plaintiffs' title an instrument claimed by plaintiffs to be an unperformed contract to convey one-half interest in mineral rights, granting defendant's motion to dismiss was error, where instrument was on its face inoperative as a conveyance, and complaint alleged that things to be done in order to make instrument effective as a conveyance were never done.—Jones v. Continental Royalty Co., C.C.A.Tex., 115 F.2d 731.

Necessity of adjudicating legal question

(1) A chancery proceeding brought under statute to remove a cloud on title to realty is not to be dismissed for the reason that, in order to pass on the merits, the trial chancellor is required to adjudicate a legal question involving title to the realty affected.—Trevey v. Lindsey, 19 S.E.2d 613, 124 W.Va. 130.

(2) A bill to remove a cloud will not be dismissed merely because the controverted question is the ownership of the legal title, but plaintiff will be given an opportunity to establish his legal title by action at law, and if he does so he may then maintain his bill to remove the cloud from such title.—Nugent v. Sale of property pending suit. A dismissal is proper where no relief is asked against one of the defendants, and plaintiff purchased, pendente lite, the interests of the other defendants in the property;[23] and where, after the commencement of the action, both parties convey all their interest in the lands in dispute to a stranger, the bill should be dismissed.[24] Where the proceeds of the sale are deposited in court, however, under a stipulation by which they are to be subject to the adjudication of the question as to who is entitled thereto, the bill should not be dismissed.[25]

Time of dismissal. A motion for dismissal for want of jurisdiction of the subject matter may be made at any time before final judgment or decree.[26]

§ 85. Operation and Effect

A nonsuit by a plaintiff who is not a necessary party to the suit to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon does not affect the right of his coplaintiff to have an adjudication; and on the plaintiff's voluntary nonsuit the defendant's answer passes out of court if it is purely defensive in nature, but a dismissal of the original bill does not necessarily carry with it a cross bill praying for affirmative relief.

A nonsuit by a plaintiff who is not a necessary party to the suit to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon does not affect the right of his coplaintiff to have an adjudication.[27] On plaintiff's voluntary nonsuit, defendant's answer passes out of court where it is purely defensive in nature and does not seek any affirmative collateral relief against plaintiff as in a cross action.[28]

Dismissal as affecting cross bill or counterclaim. A dismissal of the original bill does not necessarily carry with it the cross bill,[29] especially where the cross bill prays for affirmative relief[30] or has some independent equity which can uphold the jurisdiction of the court;[31] and the same rule has been applied where the answer sets forth defendant's ownership in fee, although not in the form of a counterclaim.[32] On a similar principle a dismissal as to plaintiff who has no title does not dismiss the action as to defendants asking affirmative relief by way of counterclaim.[33] So, where the court dismisses the bill as to some of the defendants who filed answers denying plaintiff's possession, it is not improper to entertain the cross bill of one of them who seeks affirmative relief against plaintiff.[34] Where plaintiff dismisses his petition after defendant has prayed that title be decreed in him, defendant becomes plaintiff, and plaintiff becomes defendant; and plaintiff as defendant in the cause of action set up in defendant's affirmative answer may set up a counterclaim.[35] Where plaintiff brings suit against the person from whom he derived title, and makes other persons defendants, requiring them to interplead with his vendors, and they file a cross bill against such vendors, the dismissal of the original bill will not prevent the court from determining the issue raised by the cross bill.[36] Where, however, the matter set up in the cross bill is merely a matter of defense, a dismissal of the original bill carries the cross bill with it.[37] If defendant answers and files a cross complaint, a dismissal of the complaint, whether or not it carries with it the cross complaint, will not authorize judgment quieting title in defendant without proof of his title.[38]

G. TRIAL OR HEARING

The general rules relating to the trial of civil actions or to hearings in courts of equity, except as changed by statute, are applicable to actions to quiet title or remove clouds.

The general rules relating to the trial of civil actions or to hearings in courts of equity, except as such rules are changed by statute, are applicable to actions to quiet title or remove clouds.[39] As in other cases, the party who asserts the affirmative of an issue is entitled to open and close the case.[40]

Time of trial. Under a statute authorizing suits to quiet title to be brought within two years after the act went into effect, a suit brought within that time may be lawfully tried after the expiration of the two years [41]

Reference. The court may, with or without consent, order a reference,[42] and may set aside the reference and resubmit the case.[43] Where the case is referred to a master in equity, the master may adjourn the hearing to the recorder's office where the deeds in plaintiff's chain of title are on record.[44]

Submission of issues to jury. Where a statutory action to determine adverse claims is an action in equity, the general rule that the submission of questions of fact to a jury is within the discretion of the court has been held to apply.[45]

Declarations of law are inapplicable in a suit in equity to remove a cloud on title.[46]

Survey. Where a survey is ordered after decree, for the purpose of correctly locating the land, and is reported to the court, plaintiff may contest it, and he cannot object that the order was made without notice to him.[47]

§ 87. Scope of Inquiry and Power of Court in General

If properly raised by the pleadings, the question of title between the parties may be fully litigated and determined, but immaterial issues will not be passed on, and the court will not inquire collaterally into the regularity of proceedings of another court acting within its jurisdiction.

If properly raised by the pleadings,[48] the question of title between the parties may be fully litigated and determined,[49] according to the conditions as Tender by defendant of order to have contract, sought to be canceled, erased from records, but reserving rights thereunder, did not eliminate issue as to validity of contract from case.—Babb v. Hollingsworth, 129 So. 423, 14 La.App. 273.

Validity and effect of judgment

In suit to quiet title, where effect of a judgment on complainant's title is involved and no proceedings are pending to enforce the judgment, the validity of such judgment as against such title may be determined, and, if valid, its extent ascertained so that complainant may pay and discharge it.—Van Keuren v. U. S., 46 A.2d 815, 138 N.J.Eq. 66.

Existence of lien

Although statute does not contemplate determination of a dispute as to the existence of a lien on the title to real estate, where there is no dispute as to the material facts the court may accept such a question as submitted by the parties.—Petition of Frola, 52 Pa.Dist. & Co. 357.

Legal question

A court of equity having jurisdiction may determine a legal question in a suit to remove cloud on title.—Putnam Co. v. Fisher, 36 S.E.2d 681, 128 W.Va. 383.

Where defendant interposes a counterclaim asserting title in himself and asking for affirmative judgment, the court must determine and adjudicate defendant's claims even though plaintiff's cause of action may fail.—Jester v. Jester, N.D., 37 N.W.2d 879.

Other realty and personality

In action to quiet title by plaintiffs claiming title to the realty under a trust indenture executed by aged man, conveying all his property to plaintiffs as trustees, wherein defendants filed a cross bill seeking to have indenture canceled on ground that grantor was of unsound mind, they existed at the time the issues were made,[50] and a decree rendered assigning the title to the realty in controversy,[51] or any part of it,[52] to the party entitled thereto, or having the superior title,[53] although the real title may be held by strangers to the record.[54] Immaterial issues, however, will not be passed on,[55] and, as discussed supra § 17, where plaintiff fails to establish his own title, it is unnecessary to inquire into the validity of defendant's title. The court will not examine the validity of alleged clouds on a title where it appears that, even if they were removed, defendant has an undisputed title;[56] nor will it inquire collaterally into the regularity of proceedings of another court acting within its jurisdiction,[57] or, as discussed infra § 95, determine rights of persons not parties to the action.

It cannot compel the recognition of a claim barred by statute.[58] On a bill to quiet title asserting no additional condition of equitable cognizance, and in response to which answer is made propounding defendant's title, interest, or claim, the only province of the court is to ascertain and declare such title, interest, or claim.[59] Where a vendor holding a vendor's lien sues to remove a cloud from the title, the jurisdiction of the court is limited to controversies respecting the title conveyed and the clouds thereon, and it cannot adjudicate defenses based on adverse possession.[60] Where the facts show no fraud, the court may determine the right of defendant, taking under a subsequent deed from the grantor, to reimbursement from plaintiff, holding under the paramount deed, for taxes paid on the land.[61] A party, indifferent as between the real parties in interest, can litigate no question which arises only between such parties.[62]

Although a bill is erroneously presented as one to remove a cloud, it is proper to inquire whether, on the facts alleged and proved, there is any other ground on which the suit may be sustained.[63]

Claims of life tenants and remaindermen. A person who comes into court admitting that he has only a life estate, or who is proved to have only such estate, may not compel the determination of the claims of remaindermen or the conflicting claims of remaindermen as between themselves;[64] but it has been held that, where a suit is brought under a statute, the right to a contingent remainder may be adjudicated and a party in possession or out of it may ask determination of, and the court may determine, all rights, claims, and interests, certain or contingent, of the parties or of any of them.[65]

Construction of written instruments. The court may, as an incident to its jurisdiction, construe a deed,[66] will,[67] or other instrument[68] on which the that indenture was prepared without his consent and that he was induced to sign it by fraud and undue influence, court summoning grantor may consider question of validity of trust as to other realty and personalty.—Young v. Pressgrove, 195 S.W.2d 516, 355 Mo. 204.

Validity
In a suit for specific real property where a will is a link in the chain of title of one of the contesting parties, a chancery court has jurisdiction to pass on the validity of the will, when it was alleged that the will was obtained by fraud.—Powell v. King, supra.

rights of the parties depend, but the court is without jurisdiction to construe a deed where such construction is not incidental to the relief sought.[69] In a proceeding to determine the validity of an incumbrance, the trial judge is limited to construing an indenture without regard to subsequent events as to prescription.[70]

§ 88. Direction and Framing of Issues

Under some statutes or rules of court provision is made for the direction and framing of issues to determine the rights of the parties.

Under some statutes or rules of court, where a person in possession of land petitions a court for a rule on a person denying the petitioner's title and right of possession to show cause why an issue should not be framed to determine the rights of the parties, the court must, before awarding the issue, determine the preliminary question of the petitioner's possession.[71] If the court finds in favor of the petitioner on the jurisdictional facts, an issue will be awarded,[72] but if it finds against him, an issue will be refused.[73] It is not ground for refusing an issue that the pleadings present no question of fact to be determined, but only a question of law.[74] A formal definite issue should be framed, setting forth the exact questions to be determined by the jury;[75] both parties should be compelled to file abstracts of title,[76] and the proceeding should conform as nearly as possible to an action of ejectment.[77] The only question presented for consideration on such petition is the right of the petitioner to have an issue framed, and the court cannot summarily decide the question of title.[78] On framing the issue it is the better practice to make the person against whom the proceeding is brought plaintiff in the issue, and the petitioner the defendant.[79]

Directing action at law. Under the statutes in some jurisdictions, on the timely application[80] of either party,[81] where a legal title or right is in dispute in a suit to quiet title the court of chancery must frame an issue to be tried by a court of law,[82] although the statute has been held inapplicable to controversies originally cognizable in the court of chancery.[83] If defendant asserts possession, or otherwise denies the jurisdictional requirements, and demands an issue at law, there must be a preliminary hearing in the chancery court to determine the jurisdictional facts before sending the question of title to a court of law.[84]

New trial of issue of law. After determination of the issue of title in a court of law and the return of the case to the court of chancery, the chancery court has power to grant a new trial of the issue,[85] and, where application is made for a new trial of the issue of law, the court should act on the application according to the practice in actions at law on contested titles.[86] The finding of the jury on the issue of law submitted to it should not be disregarded on motion for new trial unless there was insufficient evidence to sustain it,[87] and where no error of law is shown to have been committed at the trial of the issue, and, on examination of the evidence, no reason appears for setting aside the verdict, a decree should be entered thereon.[88]

A new trial will be ordered, however, when the verdict is not sustained by the evidence[89] or is clearly against the weight of the evidence.[90] So if, on the trial of an issue submitted, defendant claims a title substantially different from that set up in his answer, and objection is made, a new trial will be granted as a matter of course, if the verdict is in his favor.[91] Where the special findings of the jury are supported by the evidence and are conclusive of the issue of law, a new trial will not be granted for want of a general verdict.[92] On hearing of an application for a new trial the chancery court should consider alleged trial errors, as well as the evidence reported to it by the law court, in order to determine whether such issues would destroy the value of the verdict.[93]

§ 89. Questions of Law and Fact

It is the province of the court to determine questions of law, and of the jury or trier of facts to determine disputed questions of fact.

In accordance with the general rules, it is the province of the court to determine questions of law,[94] such as the construction of writings[95] or whether there is substantial evidence in support of plaintiff's case,[96] while questions of fact are for the determination of the jury.[97] Accordingly, where the evidence on a question of fact is conflicting, or more than one inference can reasonably be deduced therefrom, the issue is for the jury.[98] So, where plaintiff has traced his title to a common source, a prima facie case is made, requiring submission to the jury of the issue as to which party has the better title from that source.[99]

Whether the presumption raised by the due execution of a deed has been overcome is a question for the trier of facts,[1] and so is the question whether the land was included in one chain of title or another.[2] Where, however, there is no evidence on the fact in issue, or the evidence is undisputed and of such a nature that but one inference can reasonably be drawn therefrom, the question is one for the determination of the court.[3] It is the duty of the court to determine all issues raised in an equitable count of the petition, including ownership.[4] Where there are both equitable issues and issues of fact, the court should first determine the equitable issue, and then submit the issues of fact to a jury on proper instructions.[5]

Demurrer to evidence. Where plaintiff's evidence is insufficient to prove title, a demurrer to the evidence will be sustained[6] even though defendant fails to prove title in himself;[7] but where, in a suit to cancel a lease as a cloud on title, it appears on the face of the lease that it was never signed by the lessor, defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's evidence is properly overruled.[8] So a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence is properly overruled where plaintiff proves that he is the owner and in possession of the premises,[9] and if defendant, on the demurrer being overruled, elects to stand thereon, the court properly enters judgment for plaintiff quieting his title against defendant.[10]

Direction of verdict. Where there is no evidence on the facts in issue, or the evidence is legally insufficient to establish such fact, or is undisputed and of such a character as to lead to but one conclusion, the court may properly direct a verdict;[11] but a verdict should not be directed where the evidence is conflicting or there is some evidence on which the jury might reasonably find the existence or nonexistence of material facts in issue.[12]

§ 90. —— Dismissal and Nonsuit

Generally it is ground for dismissal or nonsuit that the plaintiff has failed to prove that he has title to the land in controversy, or possession, where possession is necessary.

Although it has been said that technically in an equity case such as an action to quiet title there is no such thing as a nonsuit,[13] generally it is ground for dismissal or nonsuit that plaintiff has failed to prove that he has title to the land in controversy,[14] or possession, where possession is necessary.[15] So where a lien, alleged to constitute a cloud on title, is found to be valid the bill should be dismissed.[16] It is error to sustain a motion to dismiss or for a nonsuit, however, where plaintiff's evidence shows that the title in him is complete and perfect[17] or where plaintiff establishes his possession and defendant offers no evidence of title,[18] and the failure of one plaintiff to show title in himself has been held not to entitle defendant to a nonsuit.[19] Under a statute making it within the discretion of the court to permit a plaintiff to take a nonsuit where a case has been finally submitted to the chancellor for decision, denial of plaintiff's motion for nonsuit made after the suit had been heard and taken under submission for final decree in vacation is not an abuse of discretion.[20]

Where plaintiff makes out a prima facie case as to a part only of the land claimed, a nonsuit will be limited to that part as to which no case has been made.[21]

When both plaintiff and defendant fail to establish title, ordinarily both the petition and the counterclaim should be dismissed.[22]

In the absence of a motion to dismiss it is not error for the court to fail to dismiss a statutory ac-

Nonpayment of taxes

Where plaintiff in action to quiet title showed complete chain of title from the United States government down to himself, it was error to grant motion for nonsuit on ground that evidence that plaintiff failed to pay taxes showed that title was in the county or some third person, since fact that taxes were not paid was not sufficient to show defect in title.—Babcock v. Dangerfield, 94 P. 2d 862, 98 Utah 10.

tion to determine title to property attached and sold separately for landlord's lien and mechanic's lien, on the ground that the question of priority of liens cannot be considered where plaintiff fails to show title or right to possession.[23]

Dismissal without prejudice is improper where the court finds that plaintiff's title is fatally defective.[24]

§ 91. Instructions

Correct instructions should be given on all matters put in issue by the pleadings and evidence.

The general rules as to instructions to the jury in civil actions are applicable in actions to quiet title.[25] The instructions should not be misleading,[26] and should not improperly emphasize any particular fact,[27] or invade the province of the jury.[28] An instruction that, if the jury find plaintiff has no title to the premises, they may determine whether defendant has title to the whole or any portion thereof is proper.[29] So too, where a record is admitted with respect to a claim that the land in dispute is the site of a highway, an allusion, in the instruction, to the record as describing a highway, not taken out of the common, but beginning at and running from it, is not error, such being the legal construction of the record.[30]

An instruction ignoring or excluding issues or evidence,[31] or one which is not applicable to the pleading or evidence,[32] is erroneous, as is the refusal of instructions which correctly state the law and are warranted by the issues and evidence.[33] So, where an issue as to title or possession is raised, it should be submitted to the jury, and refusal to do so, or to charge the jury as to it, is error.[34] However, it is not error to refuse to give instructions which are fully covered by other instructions given,[35] and the court may, if it sees fit, modify requested instructions, and give them to the jury in their modified form.[36]

§ 92. Verdict and Findings

a. Necessity
b. Sufficiency
c. Conclusiveness, construction, and effect

a. Necessity

The court should make findings of fact on material issues, but findings on immaterial matters are not required.

The court should make findings of fact on material issues,[37] but findings on immaterial matters are not required;[38] and it has been held that in an action to cancel a covenant in a lease, as a cloud on plaintiff's title, the proper practice is to enter an order for judgment, without findings of fact.[39] Under the practice in some jurisdictions a special finding is not necessary in the absence of any request therefor.[40] Where the issues are complicated, and defendants claim under different sources of title, it is proper for the court to submit special findings to the jury.[41]

Plaintiff's title and possession. There is no occasion for a finding as to any alleged title of plaintiff not set up in the complaint;[42] nevertheless, although plaintiff claims to be the owner of title in fee, if it develops from the evidence presented that he owns some lesser estate, the court may so find.[43] An issue as to plaintiff's possession of the land at the commencement of the action is immaterial, where the action is brought under a statute dispensing with the necessity of possession as a condition precedent to the maintenance of the action, and no finding need be made on such issue.[44] Where the action is to quiet plaintiff's title in the whole of certain realty as against a particular defendant, and the court finds that defendant is an owner of an undivided half-interest in the property, it is not necessary to find whether plaintiff is the owner of the other half-interest.[45]

Defendant's title. A finding on the issues raised by denial of the allegations of the complaint, if adverse to plaintiff, is sufficient, without finding defendant's title.[46] So, where the complaint alleges ownership in plaintiff, and the evidence is insufficient to establish such ownership, and the court finds as a conclusion of law that defendant is entitled to judgment, and that plaintiff is not the owner, an omission to find as to defendant's title is not error[47] If defendant in his answer claims no interest in the lands in controversy, a finding that he has no interest therein is not necessary.[48]

Vacancy of land. In the ordinary statutory action to determine adverse claims, a finding that the land is vacant and unoccupied, as alleged in the complaint, is not necessary to support the judgment, where defendant in his answer sets up his own claim to the land for the determination of the court.[49]

b. Sufficiency

(1) In general
(2) Ultimate or evidentiary facts or conclusions
(3) Inconsistent findings or conclusions

(1) In General

In accordance with general rules, the findings must be sufficient to support the judgment, supported by the evidence, responsive to the issues, and should cover all the material issues.

The general rules as to the sufficiency of findings by the court, and of special verdicts or findings by the jury, are applicable in actions to quiet title.[50] The findings must be sufficient to support the judgment,[51] and, in accordance with general rules, must be supported by the evidence,[52] and should cover all the material issues.[53] A finding on a matter not in issue should be disregarded,[54] and that part of the decree based thereon should be stricken[55] If a special verdict states such facts as sustain the substance of the issues, it is sufficient,[56] although want of a finding on a particular issue is not cause for reversal if the omission is in no wise prejudicial.[57] Unauthorized findings inserted in a special verdict must be disregarded.[58]

Responsiveness to issues. The verdict or findings must be responsive to the issues raised by the pleadings.[59]

(2) Ultimate or Evidentiary Facts or Conclusions

The findings should contain only the ultimate, and not the evidentiary, facts; and a finding that a party was or was not the owner of the land is a sufficient finding of the fact in issue without a finding of the facts respecting such ownership.

Only the ultimate facts should be contained in the findings,[60] and it is improper to insert therein evidentiary facts;[61] and a finding which, instead of stating an ultimate fact, consists merely of an unsupported conclusion of law is defective.[62] A finding that all of plaintiff's claims were barred by the provisions of certain statutes, and that the right of defendant was perfected by limitations, being but a conclusion that defendant had acquired title by adverse possession, is a nullity where no facts are found on which to base it.[63]

As to ownership of property. A finding that plaintiff was[64] or was not,[65] or that defendant was,[66] the owner of the realty in controversy is not a conclusion of law, but a finding of the fact in issue, and is sufficient without a finding of the facts respecting such ownership. A finding that the parties entered into a contract of sale, and that its terms were valid, binding, and enforceable, is sufficient, since the ultimate fact as to defendant's interest in the property necessarily results from the terms of the contract.[67]

(3) Inconsistent Findings or Conclusions

Findings which are irreconcilably contradictory as to material matters will not support a judgment; but in case of a conflict between a specific and a general finding the specific finding will control.

The general rule that findings of the court which are irreconcilably contradictory as to material matters will not support a judgment has been applied in actions to quiet title,[68] but this rule does not apply to findings on an immaterial issue.[69] In case of conflict between a specific and a general finding, the specific finding will control;[70] and, in a case tried by a jury, special findings which are in irreconcilable conflict with the general verdict will control such verdict.[71]

Where case is submitted on agreed statement of facts, such statement has the effect of findings of fact on which judgment is rendered,[72] and a conclusion of law which contradicts such statement is sufficient to vitiate the judgment.[73]

c. Conclusiveness, Construction, and Effect

Generally the verdict of a jury in an action to quiet title or to determine adverse claims is merely advisory unless purely legal rights are involved. In determining the meaning of findings, they should be construed as a whole, and so as to support the judgment.

As a general rule the verdict of a jury in an action to quiet title or to determine adverse claims, such action being purely equitable, is merely advisory, and the court may find contrary thereto.[74] Where purely legal rights are involved, however, the jury do not act in an advisory capacity,[75] and in such case a general verdict is conclusive unless set aside on motion for new trial, and will support a judgment for the party in whose favor it is found.[76]

Construction. In determining the meaning of the findings, they should be construed as a whole,[77] and so as to support the judgment,[78] and the construction of particular terms may be determined from the context.[79] A finding by the court that defendant is entitled to possession is a decision on the issue whether plaintiff is entitled to possession.[80] Where an action is brought to quiet title to an undivided interest in land, a finding that defendant had built a foundation for a house partly upon a portion of premises is not a finding that plaintiff was not in possession when the action was commenced.[81]

H. RELIEF

§ 93. Conditions Precedent

The acts required to be performed as a condition precedent to the granting of relief in an action to quiet title depend on the circumstances of the particular case and the application of equitable principles.

The acts which are required to be performed by parties seeking to quiet title, as a condition precedent to the granting of relief, depend on the circumstances of the particular case and the application of equitable principles.[82] It is not necessary that a vendor, before suing to quiet title against a contract of sale recorded by the vendee, should demand the cancellation of record of the contract, which had never been acknowledged by the vendor as required by statute.[83] It has been held unnecessary to give a notice to quit the premises or a notice of termination of a lease before bringing an action to quiet title against a lessee or person in possession of the premises.[84] A general statute requiring a bond before the rendition of a judgment against a nonresident defendant has been held not to require the giving of a bond in an action for the confirmation of a title brought under a specific statute dealing with the procedure for the confirmation of title and containing no provision for a bond.[85]

Demand for reconveyance. Where a landowner executed a deed conveying the legal title in trust, and in an action by him against the grantees to quiet title after the purposes of the trust had been accomplished and he had retaken possession of the land, the grantee set up an adverse claim, plaintiff is entitled to relief although he had not before suit

Direct attack on judgment
Plaintiffs who claimed to be sole heirs of decedent who had owned realty could bring statutory suit to establish title to the realty without bringing direct action attacking judgment in an ex parte proceeding which recognized certain parties as heirs of decedent and decreed such parties to be owners of the realty in controversy, on which judgment defendants based their claim of title.—Dugas v. Service on trustor held unnecessary
A subtenant against whom title was sought to be quieted, and who had been served with a notice to quit, could not prevent the quieting of title on the ground that such notice had not been served on a trustor, where it was the subtenant, not the trustor, who contested the right to the property, and the failure, if any, to serve notice on the trustor could be regarded as waived by the subtenant.—Mailhes v. Investors' Syndicate, 32 P.2d 610, 220 Cal. 735.

made a demand for a reconveyance.[86] The grantor in a deed wrongfully and fraudulently obtained need not demand a reconveyance before suing the grantee to quiet title.[87] Failure to demand a reconveyance has been held not to preclude the quieting of title as against a deed given on a condition subsequent, which was broken, where under the circumstances the grantee had no right to expect such a demand and could not have been injured by the omission to make it.[88]

Correction of deed or mortgage. Ordinarily, where a person has, by mistake, conveyed land, he must have the deed corrected before he is entitled to have his title quieted.[89] So a purchaser of land from the record owner, with knowledge that it was claimed by, and in possession of, a third person having no legal title, cannot be divested of his title without reformation of such person's deed so as to include the land in suit.[90] However, where the description in the deed under which plaintiff claims title is sufficient to furnish a means of identification of the land, title may be quieted in him without first reforming the deed.[91] A plaintiff to whom there has been executed and delivered a deed omitting the name of the grantee has been held to have a right to maintain an action to quiet title without having first inserted his name as grantee.[92]

In an action to determine adverse claims, brought by a plaintiff in possession of land and having title in fee thereto, reformation of a mortgage set up as a counterclaim has been held unnecessary where the mortgage is a valid lien on the rest of the premises therein described and the only thing necessary is that the mortgage be adjudged not a lien, claim, or interest on the land owned by plaintiff.[93]

§ 94. —— Necessity of Doing Equity

A party seeking to quiet title to property or remove a cloud thereon will be compelled to do equity, as, for example, by restoring any consideration or benefits received by him.

A party seeking to quiet his title to realty or remove a cloud thereon will, as a condition precedent to the relief, be compelled to do equity.[94] Thus, as a general rule, plaintiff cannot have relief against a person asserting a claim under an instrument executed by plaintiff or his privies, unless he restores or tenders the consideration or benefits received.[95] So a vendee of a judgment debtor who has received a deed from the debtor, but has not paid the pur-

Fraud in corporate stock.
Where complaint seeking to quiet title to stock in company alleged that defendant obtained a purported relinquishment of plaintiff's interest in stock for a specified sum by means of fraud, plaintiff was not required to tender such sum as a prerequisite to maintenance of the suit, but the court in its final determination might properly pass title to stock in plaintiff subject to his paying defendant the money which he received on the alleged void transaction.—Truesdell v. Lewis, 115 P.2d 218, 45 Cal.App.2d 713.
Failure to tender payment
In action to quiet title by original owner of realty which was sold under street improvement ordinance for default in payment of bonds representing amount of assessments, owner who did not tender or offer to pay amount admittedly due under the bonds was nevertheless entitled to have title quieted on condition that he pay amount due against the parcels, together with penalties and costs of sale.—Sterling Realty Co. v. chase money, cannot maintain a bill to quiet title as against one who bought the land under a judgment rendered subsequently to the vendee's contract, without first paying the purchase money into court.[96] Likewise, where the statute gives a lot owner the privilege of paying municipal improvement bonds and discharging the land from the lien at any time before commencement of proceedings for sale, such owner must, before suing to cancel the bonds as a cloud on title, offer to pay the amount due.[97]

Equity may require plaintiff to do equity by discharging an obligation which is binding in good conscience, but is not otherwise enforceable either at law or in equity,[98] as in the case of a judgment lien[99] or other obligation[1] against which there was originally no meritorious defense, but which has since become barred by the statute of limitations; but a judgment debtor's right to have title quieted as against the lien of a judgment barred by the statute of limitations is not necessarily conditional on payment of the judgment.[2]

It has been held that the equity which plaintiff may be compelled to do as a condition of relief must be one which defendant could enforce against plaintiff by an independent suit,[3] and which arises out of the transaction forming the subject matter of the suit.[4] A party seeking to quiet title need not restore property which is rightfully his;[5] nor need he return an alleged consideration which he did not in fact receive[6] or offer to restore a sum equivalent to an alleged indebtedness, the existence of which is not sufficiently established.[7] The rule requiring plaintiff to do equity has been held to have no application to a plaintiff seeking the cancellation of a security deed as a cloud on title where it does not appear that defendant is entitled to any equitable right as against plaintiff;[8] and the rule has also been held inapplicable to a debtor who seeks merely to have removed as a cloud on title a void sheriff's deed given pursuant to an execution sale, but who does not attempt to have the judgment set aside or to interfere with its enforcement.[9]

Judgment may be quieted in the owner of a homestead as against an execution creditor without requiring such owner to pay the amount of the judgment.[10] A grantor who, after conveying the property to one person, is thereafter induced by false representations to execute to a third person a quitclaim deed conveying property inadvertently excluded from the prior conveyance, and who brings an action to perfect title in the first grantee, has been held not required to repay a nominal sum received by him as consideration for the quitclaim deed.[11]

Performance by vendor of contract of sale. A vendor who seeks to cancel a contract of sale as a cloud on title must tender performance of the contract as a condition precedent to relief.[12] However, where the vendor is ready and willing to perform, and the vendee refuses to perform on the ground of defects in the title, the vendor need not tender performance where the objections to the title are technical and frivolous and nothing could be accomplished by the making of a tender.[13] Where a vendee is unable to meet small amounts in default, it is not necessary that the vendor tender a deed to him prior to bringing suit to quiet title for breach of contract.[14] On breach by the vendee, where time is made of the essence of the contract, no affirmative

Circumstances excusing tender
Where purchasers of realty could not make payments on time, and after total amount became due tendered two payments only, and subsequently sought moratorium relief, and thereafter brought action for action on the part of the vendor is necessary before bringing suit to quiet title, for the purpose of establishing judicially that the vendee had forfeited his rights.[15] On the other hand, where a contract of sale required the vendors to furnish title papers and the purchaser to ascertain the acreage within a certain time, the mere inaction of the parties will not afford the vendors ground for cancellation of the contract as a cloud on title, in the absence of an offer by them to perform, although time was of the essence of the contract.[16]

Return to vendee of money paid on contract of sale. Where a vendor, seeking to quiet his title as against a contract of sale, is himself at fault, the court may require a proper adjustment of the equities and a repayment of the purchase money as a condition precedent to granting relief;[17] and it has been held that a vendor seeking to quiet title as against the vendee who has forfeited his rights under the contract of sale must, as a condition to relief, repay to the vendee the amount paid on the purchase price,[18] or at least must repay any amount in excess of the damages resulting to the vendor from the vendee's breach.[19] On the other hand, it has been held that, where the vendor seeks to have a contract of sale canceled as a cloud on his title, having asserted his right under an express stipulation therein, to declare it forfeited on breach by the vendee, he need not restore or offer to restore payments made,[20] and that the vendor may quiet his title to the property without refunding any part of the price paid in the absence of a showing that he will realize more than the benefit of his bargain.[21] Further, where a vendee abandoned the contract and made no attempt to carry out its terms and conditions for a great many years, the vendor has been held entitled to have the contract canceled as a cloud on title without returning payments made thereunder.[22]

Where, on the default of the vendee, the vendor sues to quiet title and determine the rights of the parties in the land, the court may, after extending time to the vendee to meet his obligations under the contract, which he fails to do, decree title in the vendor free of equities.[23] If the bill contains an offer to return the purchase money, the decree should require plaintiff to keep the offer good.[24]

§ 95. Nature and Extent in General

The court in an action to quiet title will afford complete relief, within the scope of the pleadings and the issues, and the particular relief awarded will be adapted to the circumstances of the case.

The court, in a suit to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon, may,[25] and it is its duty to,[26] determine all the rights and claims of the parties relating to the subject matter, and make such disposition of the cause as will afford complete relief, within the scope of the pleadings and issues, and will safeguard the interests of all the parties, even though legal rights are involved which otherwise could be enforced only in a court of law.[27] Ordinarily the court should define the title, estate, and interest of the parties,[28] although under some circumstances it specific performance on untenable ground that they had paid in full, vendors were excused from tendering deed and demanding performance and title was properly quieted in vendors.—Grimes v. Steele, 133 P.2d 374, 56 Cal.App.2d 786.

has been held unnecessary and improper to determine whether a party is the owner of a fee simple title rather than a mere easement.[29]

The decree must be confined to a determination and adjustment of existing rights[30] in the particular property in controversy.[31] If the action is brought under a statute which prescribes the extent to which the judgment or decree may go in adjusting rights, the court is limited thereby.[32] The rights of persons not parties to the action cannot be adjudicated,[33] although the court may, where the suit involves the construction of a trust deed, pass on the rights of unborn children,[34] and a decree setting aside an execution sale and certificate issued to the purchaser, as a cloud on plaintiff's title, is not erroneous because it declares the judgment void as against the judgment debtors who were not made parties to the suit.[35] Affirmative relief may be given to one who was not a party to the original bill but who was a party to a cross bill.[36]

The relief awarded will be adapted to the circumstances of the particular case,[37] and may be granted on such terms and conditions as may be necessary to do justice.[38] In the absence of a breach of duty, the court may grant relief against a forfeiture.[39] If it is shown that complainant owns part of the land and defendant part, the court may ascertain and declare these facts and decree accordingly[40] Where it appears that neither party has title to the land, neither is entitled to relief.[41] In proceedings under some statutes, however, the court may determine the better title, as between the parties to the proceeding, although a title superior to the rights of either may be held by a stranger.[42] Moreover, title may be adjudged to be in plaintiff, notwithstanding his failure to establish title of record or by adverse possession, where the persons holding the title have expressly disclaimed in plaintiff's favor.[43]

Trusts. The court, in an action involving adverse claims to real property prosecuted on a complaint seeking to quiet title of plaintiff, may provide for the establishment and enforcement of such trusts in relation to the property involved as the equities of the case justify or demand.[44]

An intervener having the status merely of a general creditor of the estate of plaintiff's grantor, and having no claim against the lands involved in plaintiff's suit to quiet title, has been held to have no independent standing to obtain affirmative relief.[45]

§ 96. Relief to Plaintiff

The relief accorded to a successful plaintiff ordinarily consists of quieting his title to the property or removing a cloud thereon, together with such incidental relief as may be proper or necessary to make the main relief complete.

The relief to plaintiff authorized in a suit to quiet title is equitable, and ordinarily consists in a judgment quieting title in him to, or removing a cloud on, the property in dispute,[46] or quieting title to as much thereof as plaintiff shows himself entitled;[47] and the fact that plaintiff alleges ownership in fee does not preclude the court from awarding him an easement.[48] The court may also award such incidental relief as may be proper or necessary to make the main relief complete,[49] such as foreclosure of a deed which has been declared to be a mortgage,[50] or may, in a proper case, grant certain relief to plaintiff on finding the title to be in defendant.[51] However, the court should not grant relief which is not properly incidental,[52] or which is unjust or inequitable,[53] or in excess of that to which plaintiff is entitled.[54] Where at the time of the judgment there are no claims to particular articles adverse to plaintiff's claim of ownership of them, a provision in the judgment quieting plaintiff's title to them has been held not warranted.[55] The court may adjudge that defendant's claims are unfounded and invalid[56] without expressly determining that plaintiff is the owner of the land or has an interest therein;[57] but it has been held that a decree which merely declares plaintiff to be the owner, without finding or removing any cloud, is erroneous.[58]

The court may, on granting relief to plaintiff, require him to act in an equitable manner.[59] In an action against a grantor by the grantee in a deed given as security for a debt, it has been held proper for the court to give defendant a reasonable and specified time to repay the debt, and on failure of defendant to pay within the time fixed, to enter a decree quieting title in plaintiff.[60] Where title is quieted in a vendor in his suit against the vendee, it is error to render judgment in plaintiff's favor for a balance due on the purchase price;[61] but where defendant sets up his possession under a contract by plaintiff to convey the land, a decree quieting title in defendant should be made subject to the payment of the purchase price by him from the time he took possession,[62] or the decree may require plaintiff to convey to defendant on payment of the amount due within a designated time, and provide that on defendant's default plaintiff's title will be quieted;[63] and it has also been held that, where title is decreed in defendant, the court may render a personal judgment against him for the unpaid purchase price.[64]

Partition. It has been asserted broadly that a chancery court which has acquired jurisdiction of the subject matter for the purpose of removing clouds from title may decree a partition in kind or a sale for division of the proceeds.[65] However, it has also been held that, although a plaintiff who seeks to establish an equitable interest in land may in the same suit have partition,[66] he cannot have such relief where he counts solely on his legal title.[67]

Conveyance or release to plaintiff. It has been held that, in a suit to set aside an instrument as a cloud on title, it is erroneous to decree a conveyance by defendant to plaintiff of the title derived through such instrument,[68] if there is nothing to show a trust relationship or other equitable ground for such relief.[69] On the other hand, it has been held that the judgment or decree for plaintiff may order defendant to execute releases or conveyances where necessary to afford complete relief,[70] as where plaintiff bases his right on an equitable title[71] or where a trust deed exists.[72]

In a suit to quiet title against a nonresident, the court may, on decreeing relief to plaintiff, appoint a special commissioner to convey to him the legal title;[73] but the court cannot decree that defendant procure a conveyance in favor of plaintiff from a nonresident who is not a party to the proceedings.[74]

he release of such title or its conveyance to plaintiff,[75] but for a perpetual injunction against its assertion.[76]

Delivery of possession. The rule has been laid down in some cases that delivery of possession of the land cannot be decreed as a mere incident to the bill to quiet title.[77] Other authorities, however, have held, sometimes by virtue of express or implied statutory provisions, that on quieting plaintiff's title, the court, in order to give complete relief and avoid litigation, may order possession to be given to him.[78]

Recovery of rents and profits. As a general rule the court may grant complete relief to plaintiff by taking an account of the mesne rents and profits or awarding judgment for use and occupation,[79] where possession of the land was wrongfully taken and retained,[80] although there is also authority to the contrary.[81] However, this rule does not apply where the claim for an accounting is stale;[82] nor is it error to refuse an accounting if it is not asked for in the pleadings.[83] Moreover, plaintiff is not entitled to recover for the use and occupation of the land, or for rents accruing, before he acquired ownership.[84] Where the complaint in an action by a vendor to cancel a contract of sale as a cloud on title is insufficient to invoke the equitable power of the court to remove a cloud, it may nevertheless be sufficient to state a cause of action at law for the use and occupation of the premises during the time they were in defendant's possession.[85]

Recovery of taxes paid. Where plaintiff has paid taxes on the land in question, and judgment goes against him as having no title, he is entitled to a lien on the land for the amount of taxes so paid,[86] and the decree should provide for a sale by a commissioner for the payment of such lien if defendant does not pay it within a reasonable time.[87] However, plaintiff cannot recover taxes paid under a claim of ownership in the absence of proof of such payment and the amount thereof.[88] Further, where plaintiff's claim is based on an alleged sale of the land for delinquent taxes, and the court decrees merely that plaintiff is not the owner, without rendering any affirmative judgment quieting title in defendant, plaintiff is not entitled to have the judgment conditioned on the repayment to him of the amount paid for the tax title.[89] Where the court finds that defendant is the owner of the land and entitled to a decree quieting his title, it is error to render a judgment vesting title in plaintiff unless defendant, within a specified time, repays the amount expended by plaintiff for taxes,[90] and the proper judgment is that, on defendant's failure to repay such amount, the property should be sold and the proceeds applied to plaintiff's lien, any surplus to be paid to defendant.[91]

Recovery for improvements. Where defendant prevails and title is established in him, plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the value of improvements placed on the land by him in good faith,[92] and to a lien on the land to secure payment of such amount;[93] and it has been held that plaintiff cannot be dispossessed until he has been compensated for the enhanced value given to the property by the improvements.[94] Where certain heirs under a common source of title were served by publication only, and did not appear, it has been held that the court, having found that plaintiff was a tenant in common only, properly dismissed the suit without prejudice to his claim for improvements, less the rents and profits.[95]

§ 97. —— Cancellation and Reformation

In a proper case the court may decree the cancellation or reformation of an instrument constituting a cloud on title, unless the nature of the instrument forbids such relief.

The court may decree the cancellation,[96] or, in some cases, the reformation[97] of the instrument constituting a cloud on plaintiff's title, unless the nature of the instrument forbids such relief;[98] and the fact that the instrument is void on its face, and, hence, is not a cloud on title, will not preclude cancellation where necessary to give complete relief.[99] However, cancellation is not the exclusive means of removing a cloud;[1] relief may be had by a mere adjudication of good title in plaintiff,[2] and it is sufficient for the decree merely to recite that plaintiff's title is quieted as to the instrument under which defendant claims[3] or to declare that such instrument is null and void,[4] without expressly ordering it to be canceled or set aside. So, instead of canceling the instrument, the court may limit its effect.[5]

§ 98. —— Injunction

Injunctive relief may be granted to the plaintiff by enjoining the defendant from the further assertion of his claims, or under some circumstances, from the prosecution of a pending action.

The relief to plaintiff may consist in enjoining defendant from the further assertion of his claims.[6] Where there are numerous defendants, each claiming an undivided interest in the land, and all basing their claims on the same right, equity will enjoin the prosecution of pending actions in ejectment for the recovery of the interests claimed by them respectively.[7] However, since the question of title is not usually involved in an action for unlawful detainer, such an action, brought previously to the filing of the bill to remove a cloud from title, will not be enjoined.[8] In an action to quiet title to a homestead, where the adverse claim or cloud consists of a judgment against the owner, the decree should not perpetually enjoin the judgment creditor from asserting his lien on the premises, since he ought not to be deprived of his right to assert such lien at any future time if the property should cease to be impressed with the homestead character.[9]

withholding possession of the property cannot be awarded to plaintiff as incidental relief in an action to quiet title or remove a cloud thereon,[10] and that it is improper to award plaintiff attorney's fees and traveling expenses incurred by him.[11] On the other hand, it has been held that plaintiff may, as an incident to the action, recover damages[12] for injury to the land,[13] for trespass,[14] and for other injury sustained by him by reason of defendant's wrongful acts,[15] and that, where a cloud has been wrongfully and willfully cast on the property, plaintiff may recover reasonable sums necessarily expended by him in procuring the removal of the cloud,[16] together with punitive damages.[17] Ordinarily, the measure of damages is such as will compensate for the loss or prejudice suffered.[18]

Where it is found that plaintiff has no title, a claim for damages falls with the claim of title.[19] Likewise, there can be no recovery on a claim for waste where there is no proof of any wanton or willful destruction, or negligent use, of the property.[20] It has been held that, where the bill to quiet title prays for no injunctive relief to prevent continuing trespass or waste, the right to an accounting for damages does not arise.[21] In an action by a vendor to cancel a contract to convey as a cloud on title, after defendant had repudiated the contract and plaintiff had resumed possession, the complaint, even though insufficient to warrant the equitable relief demanded, may be sufficient to aver a cause of action at law to recover as damages the value of personal property removed from the land by defendant.[22]

§ 100. Relief to Defendant

The court in an action to quiet title may grant to the defendant such affirmative relief against the plaintiff or a codefendant as the circumstances of the case require.

A defendant who has established his rights with respect to the property may be entitled to a judgment dismissing the complaint.[23] Furthermore, in accordance with the rule that the court is authorized to determine all the rights and claims of the parties and render such judgment or decree as will afford complete relief, as discussed supra § 95, the court may grant to defendant such affirmative relief against plaintiff[24] or a codefendant[25] as the pleadings and proof justify, and in a proper case, where it appears that he has a superior title, he is entitled to a decree quieting such title in him.[26] However, defendant should not be granted relief to which he does not show himself entitled,[27] and the mere failure of plaintiff to establish any title or right to the property does not necessarily require that title be quieted in defendant [28] Defendant is not entitled to a decree determining his equitable interest, if any, in the property where it is impossible from the evidence to determine what such equitable interest is [29]

Disputes between defendants, who each assert title to the exclusion of the other, may be adjudicated where plaintiff disclaims after reversal of a judgment in his favor.[30] Where the executor and heirs of a decedent are parties defendant and the findings are in favor of the estate, the judgment should quiet title in the heirs and in the executors for purposes of administration.[31] A judgment for defendant, because of plaintiff's failure to do equity by paying a mortgage held by defendant, should not award defendant possession of the property,[32] but the action should be dismissed, leaving the parties to have their rights determined in an appropriate proceeding brought for that purpose.[33]

Default under contract of purchase. A vendee who has defaulted under a contract for the purchase of property, and who is made a defendant in an action to quiet title, may be afforded an opportunity to comply with the contract before title is quieted as against him.[34] However, where an action is brought to quiet title as against a forfeited contract for the purchase of land, defendant will not be relieved from the forfeiture where it was incurred through his willful neglect to make payments when due.[35]

§ 101. —— Incidental, Additional, or Alt native Relief in General

The court in an action to quiet title will pro equitable rights of a defendant which are connected v the subject matter of the action, and, where the cumstances warrant, may require an accounting.

Since the relief in an action to quiet title is s ject to the maxim that he who seeks equity must equity, as discussed supra § 94, the equitable rig of a defendant growing out of, or connected w the subject matter of the action will be protected the court in its decree,[36] and an accounting may had when necessary.[37] So, since a decree quiet title destroys all liens and claims clouding the t unless they are preserved by the decree, as discus infra § 105, where defendant succeeds in estabi ing a lien, easement, or estate to which plaint title is subject, a decree quieting plaintiff's t should specially except or reserve such lien, e ment, or estate from its operation,[38] and it has b held that the court may decree foreclosure o mortgage held by defendant.[39] A defendant has filed a cross-complaint may obtain relief aff ing additional land when the cause of action forth in the cross-complaint includes such additi land.[40] Where defendant is adjudged to be owner of the land in controversy, the court may incidental relief to defendant, order plaintiff, had only an easement of passage over the lanc

remove obstructions placed by him thereon.[41]

Reformation of deed. Where defendant establishes his claim under a deed which, by mistake, omitted the land in controversy, and the grantor is made a codefendant, defendant is entitled to a reformation of the deed and a decree establishing his title as against plaintiff.[42] However, where there has been a finding of a mistake in the execution of a deed to defendant, a judgment simply quieting title in defendant to a strip of land mistakenly omitted from the deed has been held sufficient without any adjudication that the deed be reformed.[43]

Conveyance to defendant. A decree for defendant may order plaintiff, for the purpose of clearing defendant's record title, to make proper conveyance of the land to defendant,[44] and in case of his failure to do so may direct such conveyance to be made by the clerk of the court as commissioner.[45]

Delivery of possession. Where it is determined that defendant is entitled to possession of the land, the court has jurisdiction to award him such possession;[46] but, where the petition is dismissed and a decree is entered in favor of defendant for costs only, it is error to award him a writ of possession.[47]

Rents and profits. Where it is determined that defendant had an interest in the land, plaintiff should be charged with rents and profits derived therefrom.[48] So, where plaintiff's title ceased on the death of his grantor, and the interest in the land passed to defendant by way of executory devise, the decree should order plaintiffs to account to defendant for the rents and profits accruing after the death of the grantor.[49] However, rents and profits may be offset by amounts equitably due plaintiff,[50] such as expenditures for improvements.[51]

Damages sustained by a defendant in an action to quiet title cannot be recovered unless they are pleaded in the answer,[52] and unless a proper legal basis is disclosed on which such damages may be assessed.[53]

§ 102. —— Reimbursement for Moneys Expended

a. In general
b. Improvements
c. Taxes and assessments
d. Recovery of mortgage debt

a. In General

The defendant in a suit to quiet title may be entitled to repayment of expenditures properly made by him with respect to the land in controversy, such as payments made to remove a valid lien on the property.

Under the rule requiring plaintiff as a condition precedent to relief to do equity, as discussed supra § 94, defendant is entitled to repayment of expenditures properly made by him with respect to the land in controversy.[54] A defendant who had, by fraudulently concealing his course in making advances, become an involuntary trustee with respect to the land may not complain because the judgment quieting plaintiff's title did not require him to repay such advances.[55] A tender of reimbursement has been held not a prerequisite to the bringing of a suit to recover property alleged to have been illegally sold or mortgaged, since reimbursement in such a case is a matter for defendant to set up as an alternative demand in compensation.[56] Under

Where defendant was found to be owner of land, rendering judgment for defendant for amount land earned on a crop-sharing basis, rather than ascertaining reasonable cash value thereof, was not error; but assessment against plaintiff of rents on theory that he did not immediately after judgment was entered deliver possession of land to defendant was improper, where it appeared that actual possession of land was in tenants under rental contracts with plaintiff, and that defendant thereafter ratified such rental contracts and, through such ratification, received full benefit of rental contracts and whatever work had been performed thereunder.—Hoffman v. some statutes payment need be made only of those items enumerated therein[57]

Liens generally. Where defendant has paid off a lien on the property, both valid and prior to plaintiff's claim, the latter will be granted relief only on terms of paying to the former the amount of the lien,[58] with interest from the time of payment[59]

Recovery of purchase price paid at judicial sale. It has been held, pursuant to the maxim, Caveat emptor, that the title acquired at a void execution sale may be set aside as a cloud without reimbursing the purchaser at the sale;[60] and it has also been held that a plaintiff who had not received any part of the price paid for land sold under a void order of sale could sue to quiet title without refunding the price[61] However, other authorities have held that a court setting aside a judicial sale under a void execution, as a cloud on title, should decree that the purchase money be refunded.[62] So, the assignee of a mortgagee, who redeemed the land from a foreclosure sale and purchased the land on resale under a writ of venditioni exponas, but failed to obtain legal title because the statute gave him no right to redeem, is entitled to reimbursement.[63]

b. Improvements

A defendant against whom title is quieted, who in good faith has made improvements on the property, is entitled on a proper showing to recover therefor; but recovery will not be permitted if he has not acted in good faith or if it is inequitable under the circumstances.

A defendant who, in good faith, supposing that he had title, made lasting improvements on the lands in controversy, or a defendant who has succeeded to the rights of one who has made such improvements, is entitled, on a proper showing, to recover for the improvements on his title being declared void,[64] or to remove such improvements;[65] and reimbursement will not be denied because an action at law to recover for improvements would be barred by the statute of limitations[66] However, defendant is not entitled to recover for improvements where he did not act in good faith,[67] or made such improvements while a mere trespasser,[68] or where a recovery would be inequitable under the circumstances.[69] Likewise, no recovery may be had by a defendant whose interest in the land and improvements has, before the commencement of the action, been sold or divested,[70] particularly where possession had been surrendered to a grantee.[71]

Reimbursement for improvements cannot be awarded in the absence of a demand for such relief in the pleadings,[72] or in the absence of proof of the value of the improvements.[73] Where the statute prescribes the conditions on which recovery for improvements may be had, defendant must bring himself within the terms of the statute[74]

Improvements made pending action. Recovery cannot be had for improvements made by defendant after the action was instituted,[75] except under special circumstances.[76]

The amount recoverable is the amount the real estate increased in value by reason of the improvements,[77] less the value of the use and occupation of the property, or the value of the rents and profits

c. Taxes and Assessments

As a general rule the court on quieting title in the plaintiff will require him to reimburse the defendant, with interest, for all taxes and assessments properly chargeable on the land and paid by the defendant.

As a condition to granting relief the court will, as a general rule, require plaintiff to reimburse defendant, with interest, for all taxes and assessments properly chargeable on the land and paid by him,[80] and declare a lien on the land to secure such reimbursement.[81] Defendant's failure to account for rents and profits will not estop him to assert his claim for taxes paid, where plaintiff did not in his reply counterclaim for such rents and profits.[82] No reimbursement will be awarded where defendant did not purchase the land in good faith,[83] or where defendant has paid only such taxes as he was under a duty to pay;[84] nor will defendant be entitled to payment or a lien for taxes voluntarily paid by him to protect his own title.[85] Statutes requiring plaintiff, in suits for the recovery or possession of lands, to tender taxes paid by defendant have been held inapplicable in a suit, not for possession, but to quiet title.[86]

Effect of offer to reimburse. It has been held that a plaintiff who has offered to pay all taxes legally due, as a condition precedent to relief, is estopped to deny the right of the court to decree payment by him according to the offer;[87] and that, where plaintiff alleges that he is able and willing to pay all legal taxes due on the land, it is error for the court not to take an account of such taxes and decree their payment as a condition of the relief prayed for.[88]

Pleading and proof. Defendant is not entitled to have taxes or assessments paid by him refunded where he has not made a claim therefor in his pleadings,[89] and proved by competent evidence the amount of taxes or assessments paid.[90]

d. Recovery of Mortgage Debt

A plaintiff seeking to have a mortgage canceled as a cloud on his title ordinarily will be required to do equity by paying or tendering the amount of the mortgage debt; but there are circumstances under which payment of the mortgage will not be required.

A court of equity ordinarily will require a plaintiff, suing to have a mortgage canceled as a cloud on his title, whether he is the mortgagor or a person who has purchased from, or who occupies the position of, the mortgagor, to do equity by paying,[91]

or in some cases it has been held by tendering,[92] to defendant the amount of the mortgage debt, although the mortgagee fraudulently endeavored to defeat plaintiff's title,[93] and even though such debt or the lien thereof is barred by the statute of limitations.[94] So, where a valid mortgage has been foreclosed, even though the proceedings were void, a purchaser of the equity of redemption, subject to the mortgage, cannot maintain an action to quiet title against the purchaser at the foreclosure sale unless he pays or tenders the amount of the mortgage debt.[95] Likewise, where the interest of the mortgagor escapes being bound by a decree in foreclosure, through a slip in the proceedings, and he subsequently comes into equity to be relieved of the cloud cast on his interest by reason of such proceedings, he will be required to pay defendant his proportion of the mortgage debt.[96] Defendant, however, cannot have affirmative relief for his outlawed debt,[97] and the proper judgment is that, on failure of plaintiff to pay the amount due within a specified time, his action will be dismissed.[98]

Payment of a mortgage debt is not always required as a condition of quieting title.[99] Where land is encumbered by mortgaged liens of different priorities, the purchaser of the equity of redemption, if he is in possession under such purchase, may maintain an action to quiet his title against the holder of a junior mortgage, without having paid off the senior mortgage.[1] A tender of the mortgage debt is not a condition precedent to a statutory action by the owner in possession to determine an adverse claim against the assignee of a mortgage on the property.[2] An offer before suit to do equity by tendering payment of the mortgage debt is not indispensable in an action by the mortgagor to cancel the mortgage and have the foreclosure sale declared void, where such sale was voidable at his option and he seeks to defeat the whole instrument and the lien thereunder.[3] Where the grantee in a deed, which was in fact a mortgage, conveyed the property to a third person who insisted that he purchased without notice, and there was no intent to assign the debt, the grantors suing to quiet title need not pay or tender the amount of the debt to the third person.[4] It has also been held that, where a mortgage executed by a married woman is void because prohibited by a statute founded on public policy, equity will remove the cloud from her title without requiring payment of the mortgage debt.[5]

The rule as to outlawed mortgages has been held inapplicable to a plaintiff who is not the mortgagor and does not claim under, but adversely to, him,[6] or to one who purchases the land after the mortgage has become barred, as shown by the records.[7] Payment of the mortgage debt before quieting title as against the mortgage has been held not required of one who was not a party to the mortgage and who purchased the property for value after the mortgage lien had become extinguished by virtue of the dismissal of a foreclosure suit.[8] Further, since the rule requiring the mortgagor to pay his debt is based on equitable principles, it is inapplicable where the mortgage or deed of trust was fraudulently procured.[9] Moreover, the rule is imposed as a condition of granting relief, and does not apply where relief is denied and the action dismissed.[10] Where the holder of an outlawed mortgage himself asks for affirmative relief on the mortgage, the court may declare such mortgage barred, without requiring the holder of the legal title of the premises to do equity by tendering payment of the amount due on the mortgage.[11]

I. JUDGMENT OR DECREE AND ENFORCEMENT THEREOF

§ 103. Nature, Form, and Requisites

a. In general
b. Form and requisites

a. In General

It has been held that the decree in a suit to remove a cloud from title ordinarily operates in personam, whereas the decree in a suit to quiet title is in rem or at least partakes of the nature of a judgment in rem.

It has been held that the decree in a suit to remove a cloud from title, unless otherwise provided by statute, operates in personam only, by restraining defendant from asserting his claim and directing him to deliver up his deed to be canceled, or to execute a release to plaintiff.[12] On the other hand, it has been held that the decree in a suit to quiet title is in rem,[13] or, if not in rem strictly speaking, settles the title to realty, and to that extent partakes of the nature of a judgment in rem.[14] A judgment in favor of plaintiff is unauthorized where there is no person or entity before the court as a defendant against whom judgment can be entered.[15]

b. Form and Requisites

The judgment or decree in a suit to quiet title should determine all the issues, be in proper form, and comply with statutory requisites; and it should describe the property involved with reasonable certainty.

The judgment or decree must determine all the issues,[16] definitely fix and settle the rights of the parties,[17] follow the findings and decision,[18] and comply with any statutory provisions regulating the form and requisites of judgments in actions to determine adverse claims.[19] Where the bill or complaint is dismissed because plaintiff is not in possession,[20] or because the deed sought to be canceled is void on its face and hence not a cloud,[21] the reason for the dismissal should be stated, or at least the judgment should not be so absolute as to constitute a bar to the maintenance by plaintiff of another form of action to enforce or protect his rights. Where the deed, under which a party claims, conveys the property to him as long as used for a specified purpose, a decree quieting title in him absolutely is improper, since it should provide merely that title be quieted in him as long as the property is used for the specified purpose.[22]

22. Iowa.—Presbyterian Church of

The use of an incorrect term in a decree quieting title in plaintiff will not vitiate the decree where it is apparent that such term was not used in its strict sense, and the decree was fully warranted by the pleadings and evidence.[23] Where defendant's cross bill is insufficient to warrant recovery, is not supported by the evidence, and its averments are covered by the general findings, failure to mention such cross bill in the final decree is not error.[24]

Imposition of terms. Where plaintiff acquired a good title by virtue of a sale by a trustee in bankruptcy, defendant may not complain of the form of a judgment giving him a specific time in which to pay plaintiff's claim and redeem the property.[25] A judgment in favor of defendant on the issue of title, but providing for the payment by defendant to plaintiff of a specified sum to which plaintiff is equitably entitled, should specify a definite period within which such payment must be made.[26]

Parties. A judgment in an action to quiet title in which the owners of the land were not made parties,[27] or against a person who died before the action was commenced,[28] is void. In a suit by a vendor and his vendee to remove a cloud from the title, it is error to make a decree vesting and confirming title in the vendor instead of the vendee.[29] Where the statute authorizes the court to grant relief to one of several plaintiffs, a decree in favor of the husband alone in a suit by husband and wife to quiet title is valid.[30] Where a part of the tract in controversy has been sold in parcels to different defendants, it is proper to render separate judgments in respect of the rights of the separate defendants[31]

Description of property. A description of the property should appear in the decree,[32] and, where title is quieted, the judgment should describe the land with reasonable certainty and such definiteness as to enable the parties to know from such description the precise limits or the location of the boundary lines thereof,[33] although it has been held that a decree need not describe the land where it specifically refers to the land as described in the bill.[34] Where a deed is the only source of title claimed in a suit to quiet title, a decree quieting title according to a survey which departs from the corners and distances plainly specified in the deed is erroneous.[35] On the other hand, the decree is sufficient if the land can be located from the description therein with reasonable certainty[36] or is capable of identification from such description by resorting to extraneous evidence,[37] and it is not essential that, from a mere inspection of the description, the court should be able to know what lands are intended, but it is enough that the property is described in a manner best known to persons familiar therewith.[38] be rendered in a suit to quiet title, although in some jurisdictions such a default judgment cannot be entered of course but only after the plaintiff proves his cause of action. The court has power, in a proper case, to set aside, or grant relief from, such a judgment.

A judgment by default in an action to quiet title as against a nonresident is not unauthorized and void, where there was constructive service of the summons on him by publication and defendant did not answer and appear in the action.[39] In some jurisdictions a default judgment cannot be entered of course, but plaintiff is required to prove his cause of action,[40] while in others it has been held that a default admits all the material allegations of the bill or complaint, and that, where such allegations are sufficient, plaintiff is entitled to judgment without further proof.[41] A statute providing that, if the allegations of a bill to quiet title are taken as confessed, and a decree pro confesso rendered, a final decree may be rendered without the taking of further proof or reference thereof to a master has been held valid.[42]

The court may not indulge presumptions, in support of a decree pro confesso or a default judgment quieting title, which have no support in the issues tendered by the complaint on which the judgment was entered.[43] In a suit to quiet title against invalid assessments for local improvements, the default of the municipality in failing to answer is an admission only that defendant has no interest or estate in plaintiff's property, and that the assessment was invalid, but not that there was no basis for a valid assessment.[44]

Setting aside or relief from default. The power of the court to relieve from a default judgment extends to default judgments entered in actions to quiet title.[45] Such a judgment may be set aside for fraud,[46] but the fraud must be in fact, and not mere technical fraud,[47] and must be established by clear, strong, and cogent evidence.[48] It is not indispensable, however, that a petition for the review of a default judgment in a suit to quiet title, rendered on service by publication, allege fraud.[49] It has been held that a default judgment against unknown persons will not be set aside, at the instance of the representative of the estate of the record owner, on the ground that the record owner was dead at the time the action was commenced, in the absence of a claim that plaintiff knew of such death.[50]

The court may set aside a decree pro confesso, entered in a suit to remove a cloud on title, on condition that defendant pay the costs which have accrued.[51] Under some circumstances a petition to set aside a default judgment may be considered a petition for review as well as a petition to set aside the judgment.[52]

§ 105. Construction, Operation, and Effect

The general rules governing the construction, operation, and effect of judgments or decrees in equity apply to judgments and decrees in actions to quiet title.

The ordinary rules governing the construction, operation, and effect of judgments or decrees in equity apply to judgments and decrees in actions to quiet title or remove clouds thereon.[53] As discussed

Cancellation of deed
Court's declaration in action to quiet title that deed was null and void was in effect a cancellation of the deed.—Morrifield v. Buckner, 70 P.2d 896, 41 N.M. 442.

Description of property
(1) A decree confirming title of plaintiff's vendor, and showing that land conveyed to plaintiff was part of the land acquired by vendor from his father, cured insufficient description of land in deed to vendor's father.—Hull v. Hull, 205 S.W.2d 211, 212 Ark. 808.

(2) The omission of a section from the description of the land in a judgment removing a cloud from defendant's title does not entitle plaintiff to recover an interest in such section where the judgment also denies plaintiff any recovery on in Judgments § 738, the judgment or decree in an action to quiet title bars subsequent litigation between the parties or their privies on the same cause of action, and is conclusive, not only as to all issues actually involved and determined, but also as to such matters as might have been litigated. The effect of a confirmation decree rendered under a statute providing for the confirmation of titles must be determined with reference to the act under which it was rendered.[54] A judgment for plaintiff in an action to quiet title to easements acquired by adverse use should be interpreted in the light of the use for which the easements were acquired by plaintiff and the right of defendant to make a reasonable use of the land subject to the easements thus acquired.[55] A judgment by a court of general jurisdiction quieting title implies a finding that all defendants in the action have been duly served with notice of the pendency of the action as required by law.[56] The validity of a judgment quieting title as against a particular defendant may be immaterial where such defendant previously conveyed his interest to another defendant against whom plaintiff obtained a valid judgment.[57]

The decree operates only on land within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, and has no extraterritorial force.[58] A judgment adjudging plaintiff to be the owner in fee, and that defendant has no right, title, or interest in the property, does not invest plaintiff with a new title, but merely determines what title he already has.[59] Where both parties claim sole ownership of the land, the effect of a decree quieting plaintiff's title to an undivided one half thereof as against defendant's claim is to quiet the record title in each of the parties as against the claims of the other.[60] A decree which adjudges that defendant has an estate in fee simple in the land, and that complainant has no interest therein, includes a determination that defendant is entitled to possession.[61] One entitled to possession of accreted lands under a decree of court quieting title against those in possession and those having or claiming any interest therein has a superior right until he is divested of such right by the final judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the subject matter.[62] Where the title to securities is quieted, the debtors thereon, although not parties to the action, may safely act on the adjudication, and make payment to such parties as the court decides are entitled thereto.[63] A judgment quieting title in a widow to land inherited by her from her husband cannot change the operation of the statute of descents, and confers no right on one who, if she survives, will be an heir of plaintiff as to the land in controversy.[64]

Decree as final. In accordance with the general rules as to what constitutes a final decree, particular decrees rendered in suits to quiet title or to remove a cloud have been held not to be final,[65] or to be in effect final as to all issues except an accounting.[66] his action in trespass to try title.—Kreis v. Kreis, Tex.Civ.App., 75 S.W. 2d 938, error refused.

Liability for payment of monthly sums

Judgment quieting plaintiffs' title and requiring plaintiffs to make certain monthly payments was held intended to make monthly sums payable only from income of property and not to make plaintiffs personally liable, when read in connection with stipulation on which judgment was rendered.—Houser v. Houser, 44 P.2d 816, 3 Cal.2d 371.

Suspension of period of limitation

(1) The period of limitations through which plaintiffs' title by adverse possession might have been ripening was suspended during the years in which action to quiet title was pending, and by judgment in such action adverse to plaintiffs, plaintiffs' claim was denied.—Warfield Natural Gas Co. v. Ward, 149 S.W.2d 705, 286 Ky. 73.

(2) Where decree quieting title in plaintiff had been entered some nine years prior to stipulation of defendant that plaintiff was entitled to a writ of possession, the writ was issued some six years later, and trial court denied defendant's motion to quash writ, the stipulation tolled statute limiting effectiveness of judgments to ten years.—Dodd v. Simon, 129 P.2d 224, 113 Mont. 536.

Order for writ of assistance

Judgment quieting title to land and directing writ of assistance to issue if possession should not be surrendered within certain time thereafter was held not affected, with respect to ownership of unharvested crop, by order entered after lapse of such time that writ should not issue until after specified future date.—Short v. Short, 40 P.2d 752, 180 Wash. 514.

65. Debt for sale of timber

Decree adjudging that complainant in quiet title suit was indebted to intervening administrator for timber sold by complainant from lands of estate less such sums as complainant paid as taxes on property and his interest from date of such payments was not a final decree.—Gandy v. Hagler, 16 So.2d 305, 245 Ala. 167.

66. Miss.—Robbins v. Berry, 47 So 2d 846, 209 Miss. 422.

Under some statutes a decree quieting title, where service on unknown heirs has been made by publication, does not become final until the lapse of a specified time after the decree.[67]

Retroactive operation. A judgment quieting plaintiff's title, recovered after an alleged trespass on the land, has no retroactive effect on the right of plaintiff to sue for the trespass.[68]

Muniment of title. Decrees in suits to quiet title are intended to stand for all time as muniments of title.[69]

Transferring defendant's title to plaintiff The ordinary decree does not have the effect of transferring to plaintiff, as against a stranger to the suit, the title theretofore held by defendant;[70] but, where the decree includes an order for defendant to convey to plaintiff whatever interest he may have in the realty involved, it effects a transfer of title as effectually as a voluntary conveyance.[71] It has been held that in a suit by a grantee against a grantor to quiet title, in which defendant denied that he claimed the land, and admitted that he had conveyed it to plaintiff, a judgment quieting plaintiff's title vested in plaintiff all of defendant's title, even as against persons not parties to the action, unless they claim under a deed from defendant prior to the institution of the action.[72] Where a decree quieting plaintiff's title revests the title in him, defendant's rights are not affected by plaintiff's failure to pay to a third person a sum which the decree made a lien on the land.[73]

Failure to record decree. Where the statute authorizes a party obtaining a decree quieting title to have an exemplification of the decree recorded in the office of the register of deeds, and he fails to do so, he cannot claim the benefit of the statute as against one not a party to the action whose instrument of title was first recorded.[74]

Destroying liens. A decree quieting title destroys all liens not protected by proper provisions in the decree, if the lienholders were made parties defendant;[75] but does not affect lienholders who were not made parties.[76]

§ 106. Opening, Vacating, or Setting Aside

The decree may be canceled in a direct proceeding or vacated on motion on a proper showing, but is not subject to attack by a person having no interest in the land.

Where the jurisdiction of the court is wrongfully invoked by false allegations in the bill, the decree may be canceled in a direct proceeding[77] or such decree maybe vacated on motion.[78] The decree is not subject to attack by a person having no interest in the land.[79] The right to have the decree set aside, if application is made within a specified time, sometimes exists by virtue of statute.[80]

§ 107. Amendment and Modification

The decree in a suit to quiet title may be amended or modified at a proper time where the circumstances so require.

A court of equity in a suit to quiet title may modify the decree in matters affecting the details of performance, and make further or supplemental orders, where the circumstances so require, in order that the original decree can be acted on.[81] The court also has inherent power, before its judgment becomes final, to modify or correct it, so that it will conform to the issues[82] and findings.[83] A decree may be amended on the ground of constructive fraud in a proper case.[84]

Laches not shown
Where, although defendants admitted that title was in plaintiffs, court erroneously quieted title in defendants, and plaintiffs' inaction had not postponed decision and defendants were not injured by alleged delay,

§ 108. Enforcement

The court may direct such process or make such order as may be necessary to carry into execution the decree granted in a suit to quiet title; and to this end a writ of assistance or a writ of possession may issue in a proper case in order to enable the successful party to obtain possession.

When the decree declares the rights of the respective parties, the court may subsequently direct such process, or make such order, as may be necessary to carry the decree into execution,[85] although it has been held that, if the decree orders complainant to pay defendant a certain sum in order to do equity, the decree should award execution therefor.[86] Where title has been quieted by decree against one in possession, a mandatory injunction is a proper remedy to enforce it.[87] Under some circumstances a decree quieting title in one of the parties may be ordered to be held in abeyance for a specified period in order to enable the unsuccessful parties to take steps to recoup losses on the property which they incurred without any fault on their part.[88]

Writ of assistance or possession. A decree which determines that a party is entitled to possession may be enforced by a writ of assistance[89] or a writ of possession.[90] The remedy by writ of possession under a decree quieting title is the same as though issued on a judgment in an action at law for the possession of real property,[91] and the writ may issue even though it is not ordered by the decree.[92] It has been held not a sufficient defense to an application by the successful party for a writ of possession to show that, subsequent to the date of the judgment, the unsuccessful party acquired title to the property,[93] nor is it a defense to the unsuccessful party that he has made improvements on the property.[94]

An order permitting the issuance of the writ which is permitted to lie dormant for an unreasonable length of time loses its effectiveness and must be treated as abandoned,[95] and, even though the right to the writ has not been exhausted, nevertheless, in order to obtain the writ after the lapse of a reasonable time, an application must be made to the court.[96]

Statutes held applicable
Statutes limiting time of enforcement of legal rights determined by judgment applied to right under decree quieting title of realty to recover possession of realty by execution process notwithstanding decree quieting title and restraining defendant from asserting adverse claim of title was perpetual.—Dodd v. Simon, supra.

a. In General

Under some circumstances the plaintiff may be entitled to costs even though some relief is granted to the defendant; and the court may tax attorneys' fees in addition to ordinary costs under some statutes where the defendant has wrongfully refused before suit to execute a quitclaim deed

It has been held that plaintiff is entitled to costs where he is decreed to own the fee, although an easement is decreed to defendant;[97] but where the only material issue is as to the existence of an easement in favor of defendant, and judgment is for him on such issue, plaintiff is properly denied costs.[98] Where plaintiff has brought suit to remove a cloud on his title, consisting of a certain instrument, and by reason of equities in favor of defendant there is a judgment that the property be sold and that any proceeds above plaintiff's claim be applied to defendant's claim, it has been held that costs should not be awarded to either party.[99]

A mortgagee, made defendant with the owners of the fee and uniting with them in unsuccessfully contesting the action, is equally liable for costs.[1]

Previous demand for quitclaim deed. In order to avoid litigation, and enable a landowner to get rid of clouds on his title by negotiation and agreement rather than by decree of court,[2] some statutes provide that if plaintiff, before suit, makes demand on the holder of an adverse claim for a quitclaim deed, and such demand is refused, the court may, if plaintiff succeeds, tax an attorney's fee in addition to the ordinary costs, notwithstanding the filing of a disclaimer.[3] Such a statute is penal in character[4] and should be strictly applied.[5] It has been held not to authorize the imposition of costs in favor of a defendant in a partition suit, who files a cross complaint to quiet title and makes the statutory demand on plaintiffs.[6] The demand should be made directly to the party who is to execute the deed.[7] It should be for a quitclaim such as the party on whom it is made could properly execute,[8] and such as would help clear the title.[9] A joint demand by tenants in common is sufficient.[10]

b. On Disclaimer

A defendant who disclaims all title or interest in the property ordinarily is not liable for costs; but a simple disclaimer does not necessarily absolve the defendant of liability for costs where he has otherwise put the plaintiff to his proof.

In accordance with the general rule and under the express provisions of some statutes, a defendant who disclaims all title or interest in the land in controversy is not liable for costs.[11] However, a defendant who wishes to avail himself of a statutory provision relating to disclaimers, in order to save himself from costs, should not raise an issue as to possession or other material issues and put plaintiff to his proof.[12] Thus a statute relieving a disclaiming defendant from liability for costs has been held inapplicable where defendant is in possession of the land,[13] and where he refuses to yield possession without a writ, notwithstanding his disclaimer, he may be taxed with all the costs.[14] Likewise, where at the same time that defendant disclaims he also answers, and thereby occasions costs which might have been avoided by a simple disclaimer, it is proper to charge him with the costs.[15] A defendant who sets up title in himself may not claim the benefits of one disclaiming;[16] and if defendant disclaims as to some of the land, but claims title to a part, and is unsuccessful in establishing his claim, he is properly charged with costs.[17] A defendant who filed a disclaimer but was compelled to continue in the case because a codefendant filed a cross complaint against him is entitled to recover costs against the cross complainant.[18]

Time for filing disclaimer. A disclaimer should be filed when the party first appears, in order to entitle him to costs,[19] and, if a disclaimer is subsequently filed, plaintiff is entitled to costs accruing up to the time of filing.[20]

Disclaimer and release. Where a statute provides that, if plaintiff establishes his title, defendant shall be adjudged to release him and pay the costs, unless defendant disclaims all title and gives a release, a disclaimer by defendant, without giving or tendering a release, does not entitle him to costs.[21]

§ 112. —— Amount and Items Allowable

The amount and items of costs depend to some extent on the particular circumstances

A party defendant filing a disclaimer cannot recover costs against plaintiff in a sum exceeding the amount which was necessary to enable him to file such disclaimer.[22] Where a survey is necessary to make any division intelligible, in a suit to quiet title, the fees of a surveyor called in by the court may be allowed as costs.[23] In an action to compel the determination of a claim to realty, it has been held proper to award costs and disbursements only in so far as they related to the parcels in which defendant was interested.[24]

III. STATUTORY PROCEEDINGS TO COMPEL BRINGING OF ACTION TO TRY TITLE

§ 113. Right of Action and Defenses

a. In general
b. Possession by petitioner
c. Adverse claim by respondent

a. In General

Under some statutes a person in possession of land and claiming title thereto may compel another person claiming title or interest to bring an action to test such title or interest or be thereafter barred from asserting it.

In some jurisdictions a statutory proceeding exists, or has existed, whereby a person in possession of land, claiming it as his own, may compel a person out of possession, who also claims title or interest, to bring an action to settle the question of title between them or show cause why he should not do so, and providing that on his default his claim shall be forever barred.[25] Such a statute has been held constitutional,[26] penal in its nature,[27] and subject to strict construction.[28] While the proceeding is at law rather than in equity,[29] nevertheless it is not according to the course of the common law,[30] but is purely statutory, possessing none of the features of a suit in equity to quiet title,[31] and is not intended as a substitute for the action of ejectment.[32] The general rule is that the antecedent jurisdiction of equity is not ousted by such statutes.[33] On the other hand it has been held that the statutory remedy provides a full, complete, and adequate remedy at law, which will prevent persons in possession from maintaining a bill in equity to remove a cloud from their title.[34]

Persons by whom proceedings may be maintained Under some provisions, any person in possession claiming an estate of freehold or an unexpired term of not less than a specified number of years may maintain the proceeding.[35] It need not be shown that the petitioner is the owner of such estate or term, but only that he claims ownership.[36] It has been held that the word "persons" includes a corporation,[37] and that the proceeding may be brought by a nonresident who holds possession through an agent.[38] Where the statute authorizes the proceeding to be brought by any person in possession claiming title, a married woman is entitled to maintain the proceeding;[39] but where husband and wife, holding an estate by the entireties, are divorced the wife is not entitled to maintain the proceeding.[40]

Persons against whom petition will lie. It has been held that the action lies against a nonresident if he can be properly served;[41] but there is also authority to the contrary.[42]

Defenses. It is a good defense to the proceeding that respondent can bring no action at law or in equity to settle the title,[43] that he has sued the petitioner in ejectment and has since recovered judgment for possession,[44] or that he has already brought suit to try his title in the federal court.[45] However, it is no defense that the practical effect of ordering respondent to prosecute an action to settle his title is to curtail the time allowed by the statute of limitations within which he might bring such an action;[46] nor is it a defense that respondent is a feme covert, and so under disability and incapable of suing alone, and that her husband might refuse to join in the appropriate action to vindicate the rights of his wife.[47]

b. Possession by Petitioner

A petitioner seeking to compel the bringing of an action to try title must be in actual and substantially exclusive possession of the land, and such requirement is jurisdictional.

A petitioner may invoke the statutory remedy to require a claimant to title to bring ejectment if petitioner is in possession and claimant is not.[48] On the other hand, statutes providing for the maintenance of the proceeding by a person in possession are mandatory[49] and make the fact of possession a jurisdictional requirement;[50] and the proceeding fails if the petitioner is out of possession at the time of filing his petition.[51]

The possession of the petitioner must be actual;[52] and therefore constructive possession which follows the legal title, or what is termed the "paper title," will not suffice.[53] However, actual occupancy of a part of a tract, under claim to the whole, is sufficient if no other person has actual or constructive possession of the residue.[54] It is not fatal to the proceeding that the petitioner's possession, shown to be actual, is under one who claims title from respondent.[55]

55. Pa.—Welsh v. Clough, 65 A. 677, 216 Pa. 276.

As between himself and respondent, the possession of the petitioner must be substantially and practically exclusive.[56] It is not sufficient that the petitioner has mere formal or nominal possession which he could without disadvantage abandon and then bring an action himself against the claimant,[57] especially if obtained by an act of trespass, for the sole purpose of instituting the proceeding, so as to shift the burden of establishing title on respondent.[58] Likewise, it is not sufficient that the petitioner may be treated as a disseizor at the election of a respondent.[59] However, the owner of vacant property may take possession thereof for the purpose of instituting suit, if in so doing he does not act tortiously or disturb the possession of another claimant.[60] A disputed or scrambling possession is insufficient,[61] and a mere intruder or squatter upon land, without color or claim of title, is not entitled to the benefit of the statute.[62] Nevertheless, a mere denial by respondent of petitioner's possession of the land in dispute, and an averment of possession in respondent, does not deprive the court of jurisdiction of the proceeding and require a discharge of the rule.[63]

c. Adverse Claim by Respondent

In order to authorize the proceeding, the respondent must be making a claim, legal or equitable, which is adverse to the petitioner's title or interest and which can be tested by an appropriate remedy.

In order to authorize the proceeding, it must appear that respondent[64] at the time of the filing of the petition[65] is making a claim to the premises adverse to the title or interest of the petitioner; and it has been held that the proceeding cannot be maintained when it appears that respondent, after the filing of the petition, conveyed his interest in the real estate.[66]

It is immaterial whether the interest claimed by respondent is legal or equitable;[67] but it must be one which can be presently asserted,[68] and which is capable of being tested by an appropriate remedy,[69] either at law[70] or in equity.[71] However, when defendant asserts an immediate and adverse interest in the property, capable of being tested at once by appropriate proceedings in the courts, the form of action in which such adverse interest is to be asserted is immaterial.[72] The fact that a claim is invalid on the face of the record does not prevent it from being such an adverse claim as authorizes the proceeding.[73]

Although an unassigned dower interest is neither a title nor an estate, it is an adverse claim within the purview of the statute.[74] On the other hand, a petition by one in possession of realty, claiming the fee, will not be sustained when respondent's claim is merely under a mortgage of the premises,[75] and a petition will not lie on behalf of the assignee of an insolvent debtor to compel a prior mortgagee of the same debtor to bring an action to test the validity of the mortgage.[76] Some authorities hold that where the adverse claim is merely of a remainder or reversion and does not conflict with the petitioner's possession or right of possession, the case is not within the purview of the statute;[77] but there is other authority which adheres to a contrary rule.[78]

§ 114. Proceedings and Relief

a. In general
b. Pleadings
c. Judgment or decree and compliance therewith

a. In General

There must be strict compliance with the statutory provisions in proceedings to compel the bringing of an action to try title, and the court should limit itself to a determination of the appropriate issues.

Inasmuch as statutes providing for proceedings to compel the bringing of an action to try title are in derogation of the common law and penal in nature, as discussed supra § 113, strict compliance with the provisions thereof is required.[79]

Process. Actual notice is required to give jurisdiction; notice by publication to a nonresident is not sufficient.[80] If the notice is sufficient to apprise respondent of the nature and purpose of the proceedings, it is sufficient, although not in strict conformity with the statute.[81] Noncompliance with a provision that the rule to show cause must be served in the same manner as a summons,[82] and that it shall be made returnable to a regular term or return day,[83] is ground for discharge of the rule. If service on respondent is not proved in the manner required, the court obtains no jurisdiction.[84]

Parties Tenants in common may be joined as respondents in a petition to compel them to try their titles to the land, although their alleged titles are several.[85]

Hearing and determination; evidence. The statutory proceedings under consideration are not for the purpose of settling the title to the premises in the first instance, but are merely preliminary to an action which respondent may be ordered to bring for that purpose,[86] and, hence, all evidence tending to prove ownership in either party should be excluded.[87] The court should confine its inquiries to the questions whether petitioner is in possession of the property, claiming the estate or interest specified in the statute,[88] and whether respondent is making some claim to the premises adverse to that of the petitioner.[89] The petitioner must establish to the satisfaction of the court that he is claiming title to the realty involved;[90] and a rule on respondent to bring an action of ejectment will not be made absolute where there is nothing to show that petitioner is in possession of the property but the averments of the petition, denied by the answer.[91] Where respondent denies that plaintiff is in possession, he is entitled to have that issue tried before an order is made requiring him to institute a suit to try title.[92]

Review. A writ of error will not lie to review a judgment making the rule to show cause absolute, in the absence of any statute authorizing such writ.[93] However, such judgment is a final judgment from which an appeal will lie.[94] Where the parties desire to have the legal theory on which the trial court acted reviewed by the appellate court, instructions or declarations of law should be asked.[95] The findings of the trial court are conclusive on appeal as far as they involve questions of fact.[96] On review by certiorari, the appellate court is not confined to a mere inspection of the record, but may consider the opinion of the trial court to ascertain the basis on which it acted.[97]

Costs. If one of the respondents files a disclaimer founded on a partition of the land between respondents subsequently to the filing of the petition, he will take costs only from the date of the answer.[98] Where respondent's answer that he had already brought suit in a federal court is stricken as insufficient, and the judgment is reversed for such error, the costs accruing after the filing of the answer are properly taxed against the petitioner, but those accruing before the answer was filed are chargeable to respondent.[99] If the original answer contains no disclaimer, but respondent is erroneously permitted to disclaim by supplemental answer, he is chargeable with all the costs including the costs on appeal.[1]

b. Pleadings

It is necessary and sufficient that the pleadings in statutory proceedings to compel the bringing of an action to try title set forth facts justifying the relief sought.

The one actually in possession must make the petition, and not his agent or attorney.[2] If the facts which the statute requires to be alleged are sufficiently stated, the petition is sufficient, without averring other facts not expressly required, even though it is necessary that they be shown in order to maintain the proceeding.[3] Petitioner's ownership of the land need not be alleged, but only that he is in possession and claims the estate or interest specified in the statute.[4] As to an adverse claim, it is sufficient to use the language of the statute.[5]

Since the statutory proceeding follows the analogies of equity rather than law,[6] the petition need not describe the land with the particularity and definiteness required in a writ of entry or other action to try title,[7] but is sufficient if it is definite enough to apprise respondent of the land to which the petition refers.[8] However, the description contained in a petition for a rule to bring ejectment must not be so indefinite that it would not support an order making the rule absolute.[9]

Answer. If respondent appears and claims an interest, he must show cause in his answer why he should not be compelled to bring an action to test such claim, or he will be ordered to do so as a matter of course;[10] and, in showing cause, respondent should state the facts with sufficient clearness to enable the court to determine whether his claim is one which could be asserted and enforced in an independent action during petitioner's lifetime.[11] Under a general denial, the only issue raised by the pleadings is that of plaintiff's possession.[12]

Where the answer to a rule to bring ejectment has been inadvertently forgotten by counsel, without any fault of respondent, the court may, in its discretion, allow it to be filed nunc pro tunc, if the application is made before judgment on the rule and its discloses a good defense;[13] and a defendant who has filed a motion to dismiss the proceedings for want of jurisdiction has been held entitled to additional time, after an order denying his motion, within which to file an answer.[14]

Where a judgment is the only one that could properly be rendered under the original pleadings, it is error to permit defendant to file a supplemental answer while the judgment stands unrevoked, and render judgment thereon dismissing the petition.[15] On the other hand, it has been held that the court will not refuse to consider a supplemental answer because it has not been filed within the statutory period,[16] especially where no objection or exception is taken to the filing.[17]

Disclaimer. Where respondent in his answer disclaims all right and title to the land, the case is at an end, since the disclaimer itself so filed amounts in law to a bar or estoppel against defendant's claiming any right or title adverse to plaintiff.[18] The disclaimer must, however, be unqualified.[19]

c. Judgment or Decree and Compliance Therewith

The relief awarded to the petitioner where the respondent defaults or fails to bring an action as directed consists of a judgment barring the respondent from thereafter claiming any title or right adverse to the petitioner.

A final judgment forever barring respondent from claiming any title or right adverse to petitioner is proper when, and only when, such respondent, ordered to show cause why he should not bring an action to try title, defaults in appearance,[20] or, having appeared, disobeys a decree to prosecute such action to final judgment;[21] and a default judgment entered without notice to the respondent, although he had appeared, is improper.[22] Where the petitioner is forced by motion of court to take a nonsuit, and files the usual motion to set it aside, the court errs in sustaining the motion and then entering a judgment forever debarring petitioner from claiming any rights adverse to respondent.[23] In a proper case, the court may decree that respondent bring an action, and that he shall not set up any title acquired after the date of the petition;[24] but, where it is shown on the hearing of the petition that any claim made by respondent is unfounded, no order should be made requiring him to bring suit.[25] Under some provisions, a judgment may not be entered on a rule to bring ejectment until after the rule is made absolute.[26]

In proceedings of this nature, where petitioner avers that he is the owner of a specified tract of land, and that respondent is claiming a small portion thereof, and respondent in his answer sets up no claim, except for the small parcel, it is error for the court, after the expiration of the statutory period after the filing of the petition, to enter a final and conclusive judgment against respondent so as to cover the whole tract.[27] Where the statute provides that, if respondent appears and claims title, the court shall make such order or decree with respect to the bringing and prosecution of such action as may seem equitable and just, the court may, in a proceeding by a nonresident, make an additional order requiring plaintiff to enter his personal appearance in the action to be brought, so as to save the costs of publication.[28]

Necessity of final judgment. An order making absolute a rule to bring ejectment within a specified time is not sufficient to bar a subsequent ejectment suit, unless petitioner also procures a judgment that respondent is in default.[29]

Dismissal. A proceeding to compel respondents to bring ejectment will be dismissed where they concede that petitioner has a life estate in the premises, and all that could be decided in an ejectment suit is just what respondents concede.[30]

Effect of judgment on disclaimer. A judgment on respondent's disclaimer does not operate as a conveyance of any new source of title to petitioner.[31]

Compliance. Ordinarily, a respondent ordered to bring an action to test his claims may bring any appropriate form of action in any court of competent jurisdiction,[32] although it has been said that "it has usually been assumed that the action contemplated by the statute is a writ of entry, or possibly an action of tort in the nature of trespass."[33] Where a rule to bring ejectment under the statute is made absolute, after respondent has appeared and answered, the time in which ejectment must be brought runs from the date of the order making the rule absolute,[34] and if respondent fails to bring the action within such time, a writ of ejectment filed thereafter, without permission of court, will be quashed.[35] However, it has been held that, if the answer is not plainly frivolous or manifestly intended to delay, the court, on adjudging it insufficient and making the rule absolute, may, if the time has expired, allow respondent a reasonable time thereafter within which to bring his action.[36]

While the court in which the statutory proceedings are commenced has jurisdiction over respondent to enforce its decree, up to and including the order directing an ejectment suit,[37] such suit need not be in the court of the original proceedings,[38] but may be brought in a federal court where respondents are nonresidents.[39]

8. "Webster defines the word 'quit,' so far as it has any application to our present inquiry, as follows. 'To set free as from anything harmful; to relieve or release; to clear; to liberate. . . . To release from obligation, accusation, penalty, or the like; to absolve, acquit To discharge, as, an obligation or duty; to meet and satisfy . . . To have done with; to cease from; to stop; hence, to depart from, forsake; as, to quit work; to quit the place; . . . to let go; yield; surrender.' And he gives the following synonyms: 'Leave, relinquish, resign, abandon, forsake, surrender, discharge, requite.' And Soule gives in addition, 'desert, forswear, cast-off' It will be noted that each of these definitions and synonyms, as applied to the act of a person, involves the idea of an intention of the party charged with the act to accomplish the result following it. To quit doing anything implies an operation of the mind whereby the decision is reached to abandon a course of procedure which had been thereto followed. The term in its common and ordinary acceptation involves the idea of finality, an ending of the state of, a complete departure from a former course of conduct, and would be entirely inappropriate as characterizing a mere failure or delay in the performance of an act. True, such failure or delay might be so long continued as to give rise to an inference of an intention upon the part of the person chargeable therewith to abandon the future performance of the act or contract in question, but this merely proves the correctness of the proposition that the intention of the actor is essentially involved in the term 'quit.'"—Liggett v. QUORUM. The word "quorum," now in common use, is from the Latin,[32] and has come to signify such a number of the officers or members of any body as is competent by law or constitution to transact business;[33] such a number of an assembly as is competent to transact its business;[34] such a number of the members of any body as is, when duly assembled, legally competent to transact business;[35] such a number of a body as is competent to transact business in the absence of the other members.[36] The quorum of a body is an absolute majority of it unless the authority by which the body was created fixes it at a different number.[37] The idea of a "quorum" is that when that required number of persons goes into a session as a body the votes of a majority thereof are sufficient for binding action.[38] Thus the word "quorum" implies a meeting,[39] and the action must be group action, not merely action of a particular number of members as individuals.[40]

The term "quorum" is treated in Parliamentary Law § 5 b and Officers § 109. It is also treated in various other connections throughout this work, particular reference being made to the indexes to the titles Corporations and Municipal Corporations. See also the C.J.S. titles Associations § 18 c, Courts § 183, Grand Juries § 38, and States § 38, also 59 C.J. p 92 notes 5–8. QUOT ARTICULI TOT LIBELLI. As many points of dispute as libels.[43]

QUOTATION. A word capable of different meanings according to the connection in which it is used;[44] and it has been variously defined as meaning the production to a court or judge of the exact language of a statute, precedent, or other authority, in support of an argument or proposition advanced;[45] the transcription of part of a literary composition into another book or writing;[46] a statement of the market price of one or more commodities,[47] or the price specified to a correspondent;[48] notation or enumeration.[49]

Quotations from copyrighted works may or may not constitute infringement as discussed in Copyright and Literary Property § 105.

QUOTE. To name as the price of an article; to name as the price of stocks, produce, etc.; to name the current price of; to state as the price of merchandise.[50]

QUOT GENERATIONES TOT GRADUS. Literally, "As many generations, so many degrees." In regulating intestate movable succession, the nearness of degree in relationship is very important, the nearest of kin excluding all who are more remote, unless they have the privilege of representation.[51]

§ 1. Definitions, Origin, and Development of Remedy
a. In general
b. Writ of quo warranto
c. Information in nature of quo warranto
d. Constitutional and statutory provisions generally
e. Synonymous use of terms

a. In General

Quo warranto is a proceeding to determine the right to the exercise of a franchise or office and to oust the holder if his claim is not well founded, or if he has forfeited his right.

Quo warranto in its broadest sense is a proceeding to determine the right to the use or exercise of a franchise or office and to oust the holder from its enjoyment, if his claim is not well founded, or if he has forfeited his right to enjoy the privilege.[1] The term "quo warranto proceedings" is similarly defined.[2]

Distinctions. Quo warranto has been distinguished from other proceedings.[3]

b. Writ of Quo Warranto

The writ of quo warranto is one of the most ancient and important writs known to the common law. It has been obsolete in England for centuries.

The writ of quo warranto is an ancient[4] common-law,[5] prerogative[6] writ and remedy. Indeed, it is one of the most ancient[7] and important[8] writs known to the common law. The ancient writ was in the nature of a writ of right for the king, against him who claimed or usurped any office, franchise, or liberty, to inquire by what authority he supported his claim, in order to determine the right, or, in the case of nonuser, long neglect, misuser, or abuse of a franchise, a writ commanding defendant to show by what warrant he exercised such franchise, never having had any grant of it, or having forfeited it by neglect or abuse.[9]

The writ has been obsolete in England for centuries,[10] having been abandoned probably because of the length of its process[11] and the nature of the judgment.[12] The old writ of quo warranto, it has been said, was never in force in the United States.[13]

c. Information in Nature of Quo Warranto

The ancient writ of quo warranto was succeeded by an information in the nature of quo warranto which was also employed to try the right to an office or franchise.

The ancient writ of quo warranto was succeeded by an information in the nature of quo warranto,[14] which, while differing in origin,[15] form, and procedure from the ancient writ, was likewise of a prerogative character[16] and was employed for the same purpose, namely, to try the right to an office or franchise.[17]

Under the principles considered in Common Law § 11 et seq, in some jurisdictions the action in the nature of quo warranto, in the absence of statutory modifications, is a common-law remedy, its office and scope depending on the use and limitations authorized by the common law and statute laws of England, as they existed as of the date that they were adopted, by the laws of the state;[18] but the common-law information in the nature of quo warranto never became a part of the law of other jurisdictions.[19]

d. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions Generally

In various jurisdictions constitutional and statutory provisions govern and regulate the remedy of quo warranto or proceedings in the nature thereof.

In various jurisdictions there are constitutional, code, or statutory provisions adopting, defining, or regulating the remedy of quo warranto, or proceedings in the nature thereof, and in some states the code or statutory provisions have abolished both the writ of quo warranto and the information in the nature of quo warranto and substituted an action or statutory proceeding therefor.[20] In some jurisdictions the statutory substitute for the common-law remedy was enacted to avoid the result of that remedy and to eliminate the cumbersome method of the common-law practice by affording relief through the form of a simple ordinary action,[21] but in other jurisdictions it has been held that the fact that the statutory proceeding is in lieu of the ancient common-law writ does not abolish the remedies for which that writ was created[22] and that statutes providing that the remedies formerly attainable by the writ of quo warranto and proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto may be obtained by civil action do not abolish the former remedies, but simply provide a cumulative, rather than an exclusive, remedy.[23]

At any rate the substance of the remedy remains the same under the statutory provisions,[24] although

Common-law principles in force
Former common-law principles governing the issuance of writs of quo warranto are left in full force under some statutes the remedy, while a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto,[25] is of greater scope and vigor than the ancient writ.[26]

Amendment of statute. General rules regulating amendments to statutes usually apply to statutes governing quo warranto and similar remedies.[27] An amendment to the quo warranto statute authorizing an alternative method of pleading does not change the substantive requirements.[28]

Repeal of statutes. General rules governing repeal of statutes ordinarily are applicable to statutes governing and regulating quo warranto and similar remedies.[29]

e. Synonymous Use of Terms

The term "quo warranto" sometimes is used to describe not only proceedings under the common-law writ of quo warranto, but also proceedings under an information in the nature of quo warranto or similar statutory remedies.

Sometimes the term "quo warranto" is used to describe, not only proceedings under the common-law writ of quo warranto,[30] but also proceedings under an information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto[31] or similar statutory remedies.[32] Also the distinctions between a writ of quo warranto and information in the nature of quo warranto are frequently disregarded[33] and the terms used as synonymous and convertible.[34]

Constitutional provisions relating to the issuance of writs of quo warranto are construed to comprehend proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto[35] or a statutory action for the recovery of similar relief.[36]

As used in some statutes, the term "quo warranto" is deemed to refer to "an information in the nature of quo warranto" as existing at common law.[37]

§ 2. Form and Nature

Quo warranto is an extraordinary remedy and where an information is filed by a prosecuting attorney ex officio the proceeding is of a public nature.

Quo warranto is an extraordinary remedy.[38] At least where an information is filed by a prosecuting attorney ex officio,[39] a quo warranto proceeding is by the statute—U. S ex rel. Noel v. Carmody, 148 F.2d 684, 80 U.S App. D C. 58.

Prerogative in character

Statutory quo warranto proceeding is prerogative in character, notwithstanding extension of right to institute proceeding to person giving security for costs.—Birmingham Bar Ass'n v. Phillips & Marsh, 196 So. 725, 239 Ala. 650.

Procedural changes as affecting purpose

"The various procedural changes . . . do not affect the basic purposes for which the writ was originally designed"—State ex inf. McKittrick v. Murphy, 148 S.W.2d 527, 539, 347 Mo. 484.

Substitute as effective as common-law writ

29. Implied repeal

Provisions of civil code of practice authorizing institution of proceeding by attorney general to prevent usurpation of office were not impliedly repealed by, or in conflict with, statutes authorizing institution of proceedings for removal of school officers by superintendent of public instruction at a trial with power of removal by state board of education.—Richardson v. Commonwealth, by Meredith, 122 S.W.2d 156, 275 Ky. 486.

of a public nature,[40] and is not a personal action,[41] it being rather an inquisition which the sovereignty, by its courts, institutes to ascertain whether its prerogative rights have been invaded;[42] but a proceeding by information to try title to an office is personal as to the persons claiming the office,[43] and in the sense that it is against an individual,[44] rather than against an officer as such.[45]

While quo warranto is a direct, rather than a collateral, attack on the record or other matter assailed,[46] it is not a writ of correction or review.[47] It is not a substitute for mandamus or injunction or for an appeal or writ of error.[48]

Legal or equitable. Generally speaking, quo warranto proceedings are of a legal, rather than an equitable, nature,[49] and equitable rules are not applicable to them,[50] but the writ originally issued out of chancery,[51] and in some states the proceeding in the nature of quo warranto authorized by code or statute is equitable in character.[52]

Action or special proceeding. Except in some jurisdictions,[53] a quo warranto proceeding is an action,[54] and not a special proceeding.[55]

In personam or in rem. In strictness an information for writ of quo warranto is a proceeding in personam,[56] but an information and the court's action thereon may be closely analogous to a proceeding in rem.[57]

§ 3. —— Civil or Criminal

The remedy of quo warranto, or an action or proceeding in the nature thereof, generally is regarded as a civil, rather than a criminal, proceeding

Except in some jurisdictions wherein the proceeding is regarded as quasi-criminal,[58] it is, and for some time has been, a rule that the remedy of quo warranto, or an action or proceeding in the nature thereof, whether denominated a quo warranto proceeding, an information in the nature of quo warranto, or a statutory remedy, is civil and not criminal.[59]

The ancient writ of quo warranto was strictly a civil remedy.[60] Originally the information in the nature of quo warranto, which succeeded the ancient writ, was essentially a criminal prosecution[61] instituted for the purpose of subjecting defendant to punishment by fine, as well as a judgment of ouster,[62] but it has long since lost its character as a criminal proceeding in everything except form.[63] The general effect of legislation has been to relieve the old civil remedy of the burden of a criminal form of procedure with which it had become encumbered, and to restore it to its original character as a civil action for the enforcement of a civil right.[64]

§ 4. —— Exclusiveness of Remedy

In the absence of constitutional or statutory regulations providing otherwise, quo warranto proceedings are the only proper remedy in cases in which they are available.

In the absence of constitutional or statutory regulations providing otherwise, quo warranto proceedings are the only proper remedy in cases in which they are available.[65] Thus quo warranto, or a proceeding in the nature thereof, is the sole and exclusive remedy and method by which various matters may be tried and determined,[66] as, for example, the right and title to office,[67] whether such office is a

Quo warranto as proper remedy to try title to public office see infra § 8.

Reason for rule

"The generally recognized rule that quo warranto proceedings or the substituted statutory proceedings are the exclusive method of determining the right to hold and exercise a public office is founded upon considerations of policy and necessity. It would be detrimental to the public welfare and highly inexpedient that title to a public office should be put in question whenever any private citizen sees fit to make the assault."—Jenkins v. Congleton, 45 S.W.2d 456, 457, 242 Ky. 46.

Effect of declaratory judgments statute

The statute providing for declaratory judgments does not change the law giving the attorney general authority to bring an action to determine title to public office, or provide another method for that purpose, at least when quo warranto is available.—Brush v. City of Mount Vernon, 20 N.Y.S.2d 455, affirmed 24 N.Y.S.2d 355, 260 App.Div. 1048.

trict,[80] or drainage district[81] may be attacked.

On the other hand, quo warranto is not an exclusive remedy where a cumulative remedy is provided for by constitutional or statutory provisions.[82] In the absence of constitutional restrictions, the legislature may provide a different remedy.[83]

Dispute as to facts According to some decisions quo warranto lies only when the facts are in dispute, as considered infra § 6, and it is the exclusive remedy when the relief sought is of such nature as otherwise to warrant the use of the remedy;[84] where the facts are undisputed quo warranto is not an exclusive remedy.[85]

Concurrent remedy in equity. In the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions conferring equitable jurisdiction, there is no concurrent remedy in equity when quo warranto is available.[86] Equitable relief may, however, be allowed where the remedy of quo warranto is not an adequate remedy.[87] The remedy of quo warranto has been held to be inadequate where the person interested must appeal to the discretion of some other person or body to maintain the proceeding,[88] such as the attorney general, district attorney, or the court,[89] although it has been held that it may not be presumed that the public officer, such as the attorney general, having the authority to institute quo warranto proceedings will fail to act if a petition in appropriate form and having the appearance of merit is presented to him.[90]

Equity may assume jurisdiction in a proper case although it is necessary in the proceeding for the court to make an incidental determination of title to office.[91]

§ 5. Power of Legislature to Abolish or Change

In the absence of constitutional restrictions the legislature may abolish the remedy of quo warranto, actions in the nature of quo warranto and kindred statutory remedies and provide for substitute remedies.

In the absence of a constitutional provision as to the remedy, quo warranto,[92] actions in the nature of quo warranto,[93] and kindred statutory remedies[94] may be abolished, and substitutions made in place thereof, by statute. In some states it has been held that, where the constitution empowers the supreme court or other courts to issue writs of quo warranto, the legislature is not competent to change or modify the scope of the remedy;[95] but in other jurisdictions a more liberal view is taken as to the power of the legislature under such a constitutional provision.[96]

Mode of questioning validity of franchise or of enforcing forfeiture generally see Franchises § 29 d.

Ordinary procedure for enforcing forfeiture of a privilege granted by the legislature is by a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto.—Boston Elevated Ry. Co. v. Commonwealth, 39 N.E.2d 87, 310 Mass. 528.

Meaning of term "franchise"

(1) As used in connection with the writ of quo warranto, the word "franchise" means a special privilege conferred by government on individuals and not belonging to citizens generally by common right, and the powers granted by law to public officers and agencies of government, and a royal privilege or branch of the King's prerogative subsisting in the hands of a subject.—State ex inf. McKittrick v. Murphy, 148 S.W.2d 527, 347 Mo. 484.

(2) "Franchise" defined generally see Franchises § 1.

Words "unlawfully execute any franchise" within statute authorizing quo warranto proceedings where any person shall unlawfully execute any franchise mean acting without authority and do not mean acting with authority, but not in accordance with law.—State ex inf. Walsh v. Thatcher, 102 S.W.2d 937, 340 Mo. 865.

Preventing competition

Quo warranto should not be resorted to at the instance of a competitor for the purpose of preventing

§ 6. Propriety and Grounds of Remedy in General

a. In general
b. Judicial discretion

a. In General

Quo warranto proceedings ordinarily are appropriate to procure a trial and determination of the right to an office, franchise, or privilege.

Quo warranto, or a proceeding in the nature thereof, is a proper and appropriate remedy in certain cases and it is not uncommon for the statutes regulating quo warranto proceedings to specify the grounds on which the writ may issue.[97] The proceeding usually lies to procure a trial and determination of the right to an office, as discussed infra §§ 7-11, franchise, or privilege,[98] but ordinarily not in other cases in the absence of constitutional or statutory regulations extending the remedy,[99] or even in the cases mentioned unless the office, franchise, or privilege,[1] or the right to be determined or vindicated,[2] is of a public nature.

The proceeding does not lie merely to establish, determine, and vindicate private rights and interests, or to redress private grievances in which the public has no interest,[3] unless it is so provided by statute.[4] However, where the requisite public interest appears, the fact that the relief sought may benefit,[5] or redress an individual wrong of,[6] the relator does not preclude resort to the remedy. The mere fact that private citizens appearing as relators are interested in an information or may have employed counsel to assist or conduct the hearing does not make a proceeding private in its nature or change its character from one in which the public is interested.[7]

Quo warranto lies only to right an existing wrong and not to try moot questions.[8]

Testing election on proposition. A quo warranto proceeding is not a proper remedy in testing an election on a proposition[9] unless such remedy is made available by statute.[10] competition.—State ex rel. Herbert v. Standard Oil Co., 35 N.E.2d 437, 138 Ohio St. 376—State v. Dayton Traction Co., 60 N.E. 291, 64 Ohio St. 272.

Question of fact within jurisdiction of administrative agency

Quo warranto is not proper remedy for one seeking, by way of original adjudication, a court determination on a question of fact constitutionally placed within civil service commission for determination.—People ex rel. Metzger v. Watrous, Colo., 215 P.2d 344.

Regulating exercise of powers conferred

(1) Quo warranto is intended to prevent exercise of powers which are not conferred by law, and ordinarily is not available to regulate the manner of exercising such powers.

(2) Generally, quo warranto will not lie for mere irregular exercise of conferred power, even though such irregularity may be sufficient, when tested by other remedies, to vitiate or render void the act done.—State ex rel. Johnson v. Consumers Public Power Dist., 10 N.W.2d 784, 143 Neb. 753, 152 A.L.R. 480.

(3) Powers exercised by officers see infra § 11.

Testing constitutionality of law

Quo warranto will not lie to determine the constitutionality of a municipal law, the proper mode to challenge such law would be to interpose an objection as a defense to the enforcement of the ordinance.

Ill.—People v. Whitcomb, 55 Ill 172.

Validity of tax to be levied

Information in nature of quo warranto to test validity of a school tax election is not proper means of testing validity of tax sought to be levied, although sought with popular approval.—Barbee v. Board of Com'rs of Wake County, 188 S.E. 314, 210 N. C. 717.

In Florida

(1) Quo warranto is remedial and the court will not refuse to extend its use on a proper showing made, and there have been instances in which the common-law writ has been extended and employed for purposes other than for which it was originally conceived.—State ex rel. Pooser v. Wester, 170 So. 736, 126 Fla. 49—State ex rel. Watkins v. Fernandez, 143 So. 638, 106 Fla. 779, explaining Ex parte Smith, 118 So. 306, 96 Fla. 512, and State v. (2) Test whether quo warranto will be extended to wrongs which constantly arise from new conditions is not what remedy previously extended to, but whether one complaining has suffered injury in his lands, goods, person, or reputation that should in right and justice be atoned for.—State ex rel. Pooser v. Wester, supra.

Unauthorized operation of collection agency. It has been held that a license issued to those who qualify under statute to operate a collection agency does not constitute a franchise within the quo warranto statute so as to authorize quo warranto proceedings against an association operating a collection agency without having obtained the required license [11]

Unauthorized practice of profession. Quo warranto proceedings usually are available, sometimes under express statutory provision, against persons who are practicing a profession without first having obtained the required license or certificate,[12] such as the professions of law[13] and medicine.[14]

Validity of liquor license. It has been affirmed in some jurisdictions,[15] and denied in others,[16] that a quo warranto proceeding may be maintained to test the validity, or enforce the forfeiture, of a liquor or dramshop license.

When facts are in dispute. According to some decisions quo warranto is a proper remedy when the facts are in dispute[17] and the remedy is available only where there are disputed questions of fact.[18]

b. Judicial Discretion

With some exceptions, the general rule is that the grant or denial of a writ of quo warranto and the entry or withholding of judgment in such a proceeding are addressed to the discretion of the court.

In a few jurisdictions the discretion of the court in a quo warranto proceeding is limited to the grant or refusal of leave to file an information,[19] and is expended when leave to file is granted[20] and an information is filed in pursuance thereof.[21] In other jurisdictions, however, the grant or denial of a writ of quo warranto is addressed to the discretion of the court,[22] which may in its discretion withhold Considerations in exercise of discretion

The court may consider all circumstances and conditions, relators' motives in having proceedings instituted, and whether public interest will be served or damaged by writ, and necessity for and policy of allowing remedy.—People ex rel. Petty v. Thomas, 198 N.E. 363, 361 Ill. 448—People v. Miller, 163 N.E. 139, 331 Ill. 395.

Judgment of ouster
The court may properly exercise

relief or decline to proceed to judgment.[23] The court may exercise this discretion, and dismiss the proceeding or render judgment for defendant, on the case made by the pleadings,[24] or at the final hearing,[25] where the facts disclosed are such that, if they had been made known in the first instance, leave to file the information would have been refused,[26] as where there has been laches or long acquiescence[27] on the part of the relators[28] or the public,[29] or where the rendition of a judgment of ouster would not be in the public interest[30] or serve any good end or purpose.[31] Under some statutes the trial court, although it may be of the opinion that the best interests of the state do not require forfeiture of a corporate charter, has no discretion as to whether such penalty shall be enforced when a quo warranto proceeding for that purpose is instituted and the statutory ground of complaint is sustained by proof.[32]

Sound discretion

Discretion of court in a quo warranto proceeding is a judicial discretion which is not to be used without reason and does not authorize the court to ignore a valid statute which has been promptly invoked.—State ex rel. Faizer v. Kansas City, 222 P.2d 714, 169 Kan. 702.

Private rights

When writ of quo warranto is sought to enforce private rights, court in the exercise of its discretion must determine from the facts whether there has been any unreasonable delay, acquiescence, or inequitable conduct by the relator or whether public interest justifies a refusal to proceed to a judgment of ouster after complaint had been filed.—People ex rel. Universal Oil Products Co. v. Village of Lyons, 79 N.E.2d 33, 400 Ill. 82.

"May"

Word "may" as used in act providing that writ of quo warranto "may" also be issued by common pleas is used in its permissive and not its mandatory sense, and whether writ shall issue, or having issued, shall be tried, rests in discretion of court.—Commonwealth ex rel. Margiotti v. Union Traction Co. of Philadelphia, 194 A. 661, 327 Pa. 497.

(2) It has, however, been held that in quo warranto by attorney general to oust foreign corporation from permit to do business in state, court has no discretion but to issue the writ, irrespective of sufficiency in law of the allegations of the information.—State ex rel. § 7. Unlawful Holding or Exercise of Office

Quo warranto proceedings are appropriate to try and determine the right or title to an office.

Quo warranto, or a proceeding in the nature thereof, is a proper and appropriate remedy to test the right or title to an office,[33] and procure a trial[34] and determination[35] thereof, the removal or ouster of the incumbent,[36] and in some,[37] although not other,[38] jurisdictions the possession of the office where the relator is a claimant of the office and is legally entitled thereto. In a quo warranto proceeding by the state, on the relation of a prosecuting attorney, merely to oust the possessor of an office, respondent's right to hold the office depends on the strength or validity of his own title,[39] and not on any infirmity in the title of another person;[40] and a person holding an office may be ousted although the right of the relator to the office is no better.[41] In a proceeding wherein the relator seeks possession of the office, he may recover only on the strength of his own title,[42] and not on any infirmity or weakness in the title of defendant or respondent.[43]

b. Legal existence

a. In General

Quo warranto proceedings are appropriate to try and determine the title to a public office and also, under some statutes, a private office.

Quo warranto, or an action or proceeding in the nature thereof, is a proper and appropriate remedy to test, try, and determine the right or title to a public office,[46] regardless of the value of the office.[47] Conversely, in order to justify the employment of a quo warranto proceeding to try title to an office, there must be involved not only an office,[48] as distinguished from a mere position or employment,[49] held at the will of the officer or body having the power of appointment,[50] but also, in a majority of jurisdictions, a public office or an office of a public nature.[51]

Quo warranto proceedings have been held proper to try and determine the right or title to various public offices,[52] as, for example, constable,[53] county commissioner,[54] county treasurer,[55] director, trustee, member of board of education, or other officer of a public school or school district,[56] district and prosecuting attorney,[57] judge,[58] members of board of supervisors of levee and drainage district,[59] tax collector,[60] town commissioner,[61] and township authority members.[62]

On the other hand, certain positions have been held not to constitute an office or a public office within the rule allowing quo warranto to test, try, and determine the right or title to a public office,[63] such as assistant clerk of county board of election,[64] grand jurors,[65] and special tax attorney appointed by state tax commission.[66]

In some jurisdictions quo warranto proceedings lie to try the right or title of a policeman and to oust him,[67] but in other jurisdictions the position of policeman is not an office or public office authorizing quo warranto proceedings.[68]

Private office. At common law quo warranto does not lie to inquire into the title of a private office.[69] However, under the construction placed on code or statutory provisions in some jurisdictions, the remedy of quo warranto is available to test the right or title to a private office;[70] but even in these jurisdictions quo warranto does not lie to test the right to membership in a committee which does not constitute either a public or private office.[71]

Nominee of political party. In the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions, quo warranto proceedings are not available to determine the nomination of a political party at a primary election.[72] A party nomination is not a public office within the rule that in the absence of statute quo warranto proceedings lie only to try title to an office which is public in its nature.[73] On the other hand, quo warranto proceedings lie to determine the nomination of a political party at a primary election where the proceeding is expressly or impliedly authorized by constitutional or statutory provisions.[74] Under a statute providing that all primary election contests shall be determined in the same manner as provided for by law for general elections, quo warranto proceedings may be used where available after a general election and where no other adequate remedy is available.[75]

Political office or position. In some jurisdictions, in the absence of statute, quo warranto will not lie to try and determine the title of a committeeman of a political party.[76] Such a person at the most is an officer of a political party and not a public officer within the rule in many jurisdictions restricting the remedy of quo warranto to try title to office to public offices.[77] In other jurisdictions, however, quo warranto proceedings are available to test the right to the position of a committeeman elected at a primary election, at least where such proceedings are authorized by constitutional or statutory provisions.[78] Quo warranto proceedings have been allowed to try and determine the right to the chairmanship of a state executive committee of a political party where the chairman is elected at a party convention.[79]

b. Legal Existence

Quo warranto proceedings are appropriate, in some jurisdictions, to determine the legal existence of an office

(1) "While the statutes of this State, imposing duties upon the Chairman of any political party holding a primary election, do not make the office a public office of the State, they do, however . . . give to the office a status in law at least equivalent to that of an office in a private corporation, and thus on principle make it equally subject to the writ of quo warranto".—Morris v. (3) Quo warranto to try title to corporate office see infra § 9.

and to oust the person who is assuming to discharge the duties of such office

In some jurisdictions quo warranto proceedings may be maintained in order to determine the legal existence of an office and to oust the person who is assuming to discharge the duties of such office,[80] as where it is contended that the law creating the office is unconstitutional,[81] that the office has been abolished,[82] or that the court, district, or municipality of which defendant or respondent claims to be an officer was not legally created or organized[83] or has been legally abolished or terminated.[84]

In other jurisdictions it has been held or stated that quo warranto will not lie to try title to an office not shown to have a legal existence,[85] and, while some of the decisions to this effect involved only the question whether any office at all, as distinguished from a mere position or employment, had been created by law,[86] others hold that quo warranto proceedings do not lie for the usurpation of an office created by an unconstitutional law.[87]

A relator cannot assert a legitimate claim to an office in a quo warranto proceeding where the office claimed by relator does not exist.[88]

§ 9. —— Office in Private Corporation

pressly authorize quo warranto proceedings to try and determine title to an office in a corporation,[91] but under such statutes the proceedings will not lie against persons who are not officers.[92] Apart from statute, an office in a private corporation, created and chartered by the state, is deemed to be of a public character,[93] or the public is deemed to have an interest therein,[94] in such a sense and to such an extent as to render the remedy available against a person who, not being lawfully entitled to do so, holds the office.

Quo warranto is not available to test the legality of the official action of corporate officers.[95]

§ 10. —— Possession and User of Office

Quo warranto proceedings to try the right to an office ordinarily will not lie unless the defendant or respondent is in actual present possession and user of the office.

In order to maintain a proceeding by quo warranto to try the right to an office, it has been held in many decisions that it must appear that defendant or respondent is in actual present possession and user of the office[96] in question.[97] It is not sufficient that the person against whom the jurisdiction is invoked should have merely claimed the right to take the official oath, but an absolute user must also be shown.[98] An incumbent of an office cannot proceed by quo warranto against another person who does not usurp or unlawfully hold or execute such office,[99] even though steps are taken which threaten to disturb the incumbent in the enjoyment of his term.[1] However, the remedy of quo warranto is available where the relator and respondent are each in part possession, and are performing part of the duties, of the office.[2]

In some jurisdictions, it has been held that it is not indispensable to justify quo warranto proceedings that there be a contest between two claimants for the same office[3] so that the proceedings may be maintained, although respondent disclaims all right and title to the office in question.[4]

§ 11. —— Particular Grounds

Quo warranto proceedings may be maintained against an incumbent of an office on various grounds, such as usurpation of the office, ineligibility or disqualification, failure to qualify, illegality of the election and forfeiture of the office.

Quo warranto proceedings may be maintained against an incumbent of an office on various particular grounds some of which are specifically provided for by statute.[5] The particular grounds include his intrusion into, or usurpation of, the office,[6] the appointment of him to fill a vacancy which did not legally exist,[7] or acceptance of an incompatible office,[8] and his exercise of the office after the expiration of the term for which he was elected or appointed.[9] Under a statute declaring that the writ of quo warranto may issue to inquire into the right of any person to any public office the duties of which he is in fact discharging, the writ may not be used merely to obtain an advisory opinion as to the termination of a respondent's term of office.[10]

Failure to qualify by filing the bond and taking the oath required is ground for ouster by quo warranto, at least where such failure results in a vacancy in the office,[11] but the rule is otherwise as to a failure to take the oath, or do some other act, within the required time, where it is done before the institution of the proceeding.[12]

What constitutes usurpation

(1) Usurpation of public office authorizing quo warranto action may be with or without forcible seizure of office, and prerogatives thereof, and may consist of mere unauthorized assumption and exercise of power in performing duties of office on claim of right thereto.—State ex rel. Kirk v. Wheatley, 12 N.E.2d 491, 133 Ohio St. 164

Quo warranto "will lie to test the qualifications of one to hold office when they are sufficient to make it unlawful for him with them to hold the office. Those qualifications must go to his eligibility to hold the office or [be] sufficient to cause its forfeiture."—State ex rel. McIntyre v. McEachern, 166 So. 36, 39, 231 Ala. 609.

Legislature may provide for removal by quo warranto for something which renders officer incapable of holding office or ineligible to office.—State ex rel. Chambers v. Bates, 171 So. 370, 233 Ala. 251.

Violation of Corrupt Practice Act

Candidate or office holder who violates Corrupt Practice Act in way which makes him ineligible or disqualified by its terms becomes "usurper," "intruder," or "unlawful holder of office" and may be removed by quo warranto.—State ex rel. Chambers v. Bates, supra.

Acceptance of campaign contributions

Under statute providing that if on audit of expense account of candidate it shall appear that he has accepted any contributions, incurred son,[14] such as a clerk or inspector officiating at the election at which the incumbent was elected,[15] constitutes a ground for a quo warranto proceeding It has been held that an officer elected by the people may be ousted in quo warranto proceedings where he does not possess the statutory professional qualifications,[16] but it has also been held that quo warranto proceedings will not lie to oust an appointed officer whose professional qualifications have been passed on by the officer or agency appointing him or by a civil service commission.[17] Where the incumbent becomes ineligible to hold office, and continues to exercise its functions he may be ousted by quo warranto proceedings[18] as a usurper.[19] Where the office becomes vacant as a result of the removal of the residence of the incumbent outside of the district, quo warranto proceedings are proper to oust him from office.[20] Quo warranto proceedings against certain members of the state legislature on the ground that such members are not eligible and qualified to act as members because of the legislature's failure to reapportion the state into districts on the basis of population as required by the constitution may not be maintained because of the lack of power of the court to coerce legislative reapportionment of the state.[21]

Illegality of election. Unless a statutory election contest is an exclusive remedy in the particular jurisdiction, as considered in Elections § 247 b, quo warranto may be maintained against the incumbent of an office on the ground of illegality in his election.[22] Quo warranto does not lie to review a statutory election contest,[23] but the rule is not applicable where the contest is a nullity.[24] Quo warranto will not lie to set aside an election which has become final for the reason that no contest has been instituted.[25]

Acts and conduct of officer; forfeiture and removal. The mere function of an office, as distinguished from the office itself, may not be the subject of quo warranto.[26] Quo warranto proceedings may not be maintained to command the performance of official functions by an officer to whom they may run.[27] A quo warranto proceeding against an officer is not a proper remedy to test the legality of his past or future conduct or acts and to compel, restrain, or obtain a review of such conduct or acts where they do not ipso facto operate as, or constitute grounds for, forfeiture of the office and neither title any expense, or disbursed any money in contravention of the statute the court of quarter sessions shall certify the fact to the attorney general who shall file a suggestion for a writ of quo warranto against such candidate, the legislature did not contemplate that every passive act or omission should automatically visit on candidates the drastic penalty of quo warranto proceedings but contemplated such penalty only on a showing of fraud or corruption. —In re Laub, 21 A.2d 575, 145 Pa. Failure of officer to exercise individual judgment

Members of board of education who had unquestionable title to their office, but who, in keeping with campaign pledges, failed to exercise their own individual judgment and discretion in performance of their duties did not "unlawfully hold or exercise any public office" within meaning of statute authorizing removal of person who so holds or exercises an office in an action in the nature of quo warranto, since such words refer to right of holder of office to act as an officer and do not refer to his acts in discharge of his duties.—State ex rel. Brister v. Weston, 6 N.W.2d 618, 241 Wis. 541.

to the office nor the right to a franchise is involved.[28] Where the constitution or statutes in conformity therewith intrusts an officer with the performance of a certain governmental function and he proceeds to perform that function in a manner contrary to law, there is no usurpation and quo warranto will not lie,[29] but where the officer steps entirely outside of the scope of his authority to exercise a function which the constitution or statutes do not confer on him, the remedy of quo warranto is available.[30]

Quo warranto proceedings may be maintained, sometimes as a result of express statutory provision, against an incumbent of an office because of forfeiture of the office by misconduct.[31] The proceedings may be maintained on account of a forfeiture of office when such forfeiture automatically results from the officer's acts or misconduct,[32] or where a forfeiture of the office, or the removal of the incumbent, has been declared by competent authority,[33] or where forfeiture occurs on conviction in a criminal prosecution.[34]

Where an officer has been removed from office, quo warranto proceedings are not appropriate to determine whether the removal proceedings were free of error.[35]

§ 13. —— Public Corporation

Quo warranto proceedings are proper to attack the legal existence of, or the validity of the organization of or of the annexation of territory to, a municipal or other public corporation.

Quo warranto, or a proceeding in the nature thereof, is a proper mode of attacking the legal existence, or the validity of the organization, of a municipal or other public corporation,[36] such as a city, town, or village,[37] a county,[38] a township,[39] a school district,[40] a road district,[41] a drainage district,[42] or a levee district.[43] In addition, quo warranto proceedings lie to test the validity of the annexation of lands or territory to a municipal corporation,[44] or school district[45] or to test the validity of the annexation of territory to a drainage district,[46] or a reduction of the territory of a city.[47] Quo warranto proceedings will not, however, lie where the land or territory has not yet been annexed and respondent has not yet assumed to exercise authority over it.[48]

The particular grounds on which the incorporation, organization, or annexation may be attacked by a quo warranto proceeding include fraud in obtaining the charter or in the incorporation, organization, or annexation proceedings,[49] lack of jurisdiction of such proceedings,[50] and the invalidity, on its face, of an order establishing a district,[51] but, except on these grounds, a quo warranto proceeding cannot be maintained for the purpose of attacking the judicial action or determination of a court or judge in the incorporation, organization, or annexation proceedings,[52] and, in some jurisdiction a like rule obtains as to the findings of a board[53] or officer[54] in such proceedings.

What constitutes fraud

Municipal corporation as "corporation"

(1) Municipal corporation is "corporation" within statute authorizing an information in the nature of quo warranto where any "corporation" exercises powers not conferred by law.—People ex rel. Gage v. Village of Wilmette, 31 N.E.2d 774, 375 Ill. 420—People v. City of Chicago, 182 N.E. 419, 349 Ill. 304.

(2) Nature and status generally see Municipal Corporations § 8.

"Exercise of power"

(1) Within statute authorizing the filing of an information in the nature of quo warranto where a corporation "exercises power" not conferred by law, a city by passing ordinance granting permit to establish local transportation system and obligating itself to construct subways thereby "exercised powers"—People v. City of Chicago, supra.

(2) Mere acceptance by grantee of right under ordinance to operate local transportation system is not "exercise of power" by city within statute.—People v. City of Chicago, supra.

Testing right to tax bonds, etc.

for quo warranto proceedings;[57] nor will quo warranto lie against a municipal corporation to enforce the exercise of a corporate power,[58] the remedy being inapplicable because the judgment would be forfeiture.[59]

§ 14. —— Private Corporation

Quo warranto proceedings are proper to vacate the charter of a private corporation, to oust it from exercising particular franchises or powers, or to oust it from continuing ultra vires or offensive acts or conduct.

On proper grounds quo warranto proceedings may be maintained, sometimes under statutes expressly so providing, to forfeit or vacate the charter of a private corporation or to oust it from the franchise to be a corporation,[60] to oust it from exercising particular franchises or powers,[61] or to oust it from continuing, or to compel it to desist from, certain ultra vires or offensive acts or conduct.[62] The proceedings may be employed to test or attack the legal existence of a corporation,[63] or they may be based on the usurpation and exercise by a corporation of powers, franchises, or privileges which it is not authorized, or is forbidden, to exercise,[64] the mis

Contravention of public policy

Issuance of writ of quo warranto does not depend on whether corporation contravenes public policy, but whether its acts come within prohibition of quo warranto statute providing for issuance of writ where corporation exercises powers not conferred by law.—People v. White Circle League of America, 97 N.E.2d 811, 408 Ill. 564.

Exercising franchise in contravention of law

A corporation which fixes a rate of freight per hundred pounds for carrying petroleum oil in tank cars which is substantially lower than its rate for transporting in barrels in carload lots exercises "a franchise, privilege, or right, in contravention of law," within the meaning of a statute which authorizes an action of quo warranto to be brought against a corporation under these circumstances.—State v. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co., 23 N.E. 928, 47 Ohio St. 130, 7 L.R.A. 319.

Repeal of statute

Provision of Quo Warranto Act concerned in part with corporate ex-

user or nonuser of its charter or franchises,[65] or its violation of a statute.[66] Quo warranto proceedings lie against a private corporation for violation of the criminal laws of the state.[67] The proceedings will lie for one clear inexcusable violation of the criminal laws of the state and persistent and repeated violations are not required.[68]

The general rule, discussed supra § 6, that, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, quo warranto proceedings lie only to redress a public grievance, applies to quo warranto proceedings against a private corporation.[69]

Municipal franchise. Except in some jurisdictions,[70] the fact that the grant, consent, franchise, or license involved is one to use the streets of a city does not prevent the employment of quo warranto proceedings against a corporation.[71]

Foreign corporation. Quo warranto proceedings are proper to oust a foreign corporation on the ground that it is exercising its franchises within the state in contravention or without authority of law,[72] but a state cannot, by quo warranto, inquire whether a foreign de facto corporation has a legal existence, since that question is determinable only by the state under whose laws the corporation claims to be organized.[73]

Fraud or bad faith. Quo warranto is an appropriate remedy where fraud has been practiced in

Proceeding to test validity of license

The proper remedy to test the validity of a license issued to a foreign corporation is quo warranto, brought directly against the corporation, and not mandamus to compel the licensing official to revoke the license.—State v. Gearhart, 135 N.E. 606, 104 Ohio St. 422.

Fact that superintendent of insurance has exclusive control of all matters of insurance rates would not preclude maintenance of quo warranto proceedings based on misconduct of foreign insurance companies in securing approval of proposed rates.—State, on Inf. of McKittrick, v. organizing, or in obtaining the charter of, a corporation,[74] or where the corporate franchise has been used for the purpose of defrauding the public,[75] or there has been a misrepresentation of facts in reports to the secretary of state.[76] On the other hand, mere lack of good faith is not ground for ouster,[77] and the facts in a particular case may not be sufficient to constitute fraud.[78] Quo warranto will not lie to ascertain whether a corporation intends in good faith to carry out the express purpose of its organization.[79]

Property and taxation matters. The state may contest the claim of a corporation to use state lands;[80] and if the corporation's ownership of its property is limited to the time of its existence, its charter providing that thereafter the property shall be the property of a city, quo warranto to enforce such forfeiture may be sustained;[81] but, except on such grounds, and unless otherwise provided by statute,[82] it will not be divested of its property, although it is ousted of the right to exercise its franchises;[83] and if it takes and uses for a private purpose the land of a private person, it cannot be ousted from possession of the land by quo warranto.[84]

There is no authority to maintain quo warranto proceedings against a corporation because of its failure to pay a tax assessed and charged against it.[85] Some statutes relating to quo warranto proceedings do not authorize such a proceeding to obtain a judgment withdrawing from a corporation's property the immunity from taxation conferred by statute.[86]

§ 15. Existence and Adequacy of Other Remedies

Quo warranto proceedings ordinarily will not lie where there exists another adequate remedy at law or in equity.

As a general rule, quo warranto will not lie if another adequate remedy exists at law or in equity.[87] The rule is applicable only in cases wherein the redress of the relator's private injury is the main object and the fact that the relator, or other individuals aggrieved, can seek their remedy in another manner is no bar to proceedings by the state or its officers.[88] Resort to quo warranto proceedings is not precluded by the existence of another remedy where it cannot be said that the other remedy is complete and adequate.[89]

Administrative remedies. Quo warranto will not lie where plaintiff has failed to avail himself of administrative remedies,[90] provided the remedy is adequate.[91]

91. Ariz.—Garcia v. Sedillo, 218 P. 2d 721, 70 Ariz. 192.

Criminal prosecution. It is no bar to quo warranto against a corporation for misusing its powers or franchises that the acts constituting such misuser have rendered it or its officers criminally liable [92] A statute providing for a criminal prosecution does not bar quo warranto proceedings where such statute does not afford an adequate remedy.[93]

Remedy provided in franchise or contract does not exclude quo warranto, or proceedings in the nature thereof, by the state or a municipality [94]

Statutory remedy The general rule that quo warranto does not lie if another adequate remedy exists may be applicable where another adequate remedy is provided by statute,[95] at least where the statute providing the remedy clearly manifests an intent to supersede the remedy of quo warranto;[96] but unless an intention to the contrary clearly appears, the statutory remedy will be considered cumulative rather than exclusive.[97] Quo warranto proceedings are not precluded where the issue involved may not be tried in the statutory proceeding.[98] A statute providing a remedy in favor of municipalities for the enforcement of the municipal franchise contracts of public service corporations is no bar to quo warranto by the state,[99] and a statute providing a remedy by appeal or writ of error to review a final order of a court in a proceeding to organize a drainage district does not prevent an attack on the order in quo warranto proceedings where the order was entered at a time when the court was without jurisdiction.[1]

Repeal of charter. The right reserved by the legislature to repeal a charter which it has granted does not impair the right to proceed by quo warranto in case the legislature does not exercise its power [2]

Impeachment. It has been held that officers subject to impeachment under constitutional provisions cannot be removed from office by quo warranto.[3] However, it has also been held that the power to impeach executive officers, vested in the legislature, does not affect the jurisdiction of the supreme court to try the right to office, since such right to an office is a proper matter of judicial cognizance, and impeachment is not a remedy equivalent to, or intended to take the place of, quo warranto [4]

II. JURISDICTION, PROCEEDINGS, AND RELIEF

§ 16. Practice and Procedure Generally

The practice and procedure belonging to the common-law information in the nature of quo warranto have been adopted by some states as part of the common law.

The practice and procedure belonging to the common-law information in the nature of quo warranto have been adopted by some states as part of the common law.[5] Various code or statutory provisions have prescribed or regulated the procedure in quo warranto proceedings[6] and some of these provisions are exclusive of the common law,[7] but in some jurisdictions the procedure is governed by the common law as modified by statute.[8] In a number of jurisdictions, such as those wherein there are statutes abolishing the writ of quo warranto, and an information in the nature thereof, and substituting a civil action therefor, the action is governed by the same rules of practice and procedure as other actions.[9]

§ 17. Conditions Precedent in General

Conviction in a criminal prosecution, or judgment of forfeiture, is not a condition precedent to quo warranto for forfeiture of an office where the officer's misconduct ipso facto works a forfeiture of office.

Where an officer's misconduct ipso facto works a forfeiture of office, conviction in a criminal prosecution[10] or judgment of forfeiture[11] is not a condition precedent to quo warranto for forfeiture of an office, but conviction in a criminal prosecution is a condition precedent where, under constitutional or statutory provisions, the forfeiture of an office is dependent on conviction.[12] It seems that a judgment denying the right of a person to an office is an obstacle which would have to be removed before a quo warranto action could be maintained by such person to try title to the office.[13]

Matters held not to be conditions precedent to a quo warranto proceeding to try title to an office include a judicial declaration of a vacancy in the office,[14] the service of a notice of removal from the office,[15] the issuance of a commission to the office by the governor,[16] the making of an objection before election officials to the counting of ballots,[17] the securing of a recount of ballots by mandamus proceedings,[18] and compliance by claimant with the formal requirements for induction into the office,[19] such as the taking, or offering to take, an oath of office.[20] Presentation to school officials of the question of the validity of the acts of a school district in exercising taxing power over territory beyond its boundaries is not a condition precedent to maintenance of quo warranto proceedings to determine such question.[21]

21. Tex.—McLeod Independent School Dist. v. Kildare Independent School Dist., Civ.App., 157 S. W.2d 181, error refused.

Security for costs. In accordance with statutory provisions, the giving of security for costs is a condition precedent to the right to institute quo warranto proceedings,[22] and, in the absence of an order of the judge of the circuit court to institute the proceedings without giving security, failure to give security is jurisdictional and fatal to the proceedings.[23]

§ 18. Consent of Attorney General or Prosecuting Attorney

The consent of the attorney general or prosecutor is ordinarily necessary to the institution of quo warranto proceedings, although under exceptional circumstances or statutory authorization such a proceeding may be instituted by a private person without the consent of such official.

Generally speaking, the institution of a quo warranto proceeding or the making of an application for leave of court to institute it, is a matter within the discretion of the attorney general or prosecuting attorney,[24] and, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise,[25] the proceeding cannot be instituted or maintained without his consent.[26] In a case which is of purely public interest and does not involve any private or individual right or grievance the foregoing rules have been held to obtain to their full extent,[27] and the discretion of the attorney general or

Insufficient amount

(1) In quo warranto proceeding, trial court committed error by forcing respondent to a hearing on the merits of the suit where a penalty bond filed by relators was insufficient under statute governing quo warranto proceedings—Ex parte Talley, supra.

(2) Where an instrument filed as security for costs on bringing of quo warranto proceeding was defective because it was for an insufficient amount and signed only by relators, trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting a good and sufficient security to be filed and approved on hearing of motion to quash the summons where relators were acting in good faith—Ex parte Talley, supra.

Signature

An instrument filed as security for costs in quo warranto proceeding which was signed only by parties to action was not the "security" required by statute to be given, since obligors were only those already bound for costs as parties.—Ex parte Talley, supra.

Refusal to interfere

The judgment of attorney general, who refused to institute quo warranto proceedings or to give his consent thereto to question legality of appointment of village recorder by village council after court had declared that there was vacancy in such office, would not be interfered with by court, where exceptional circumstances were not disclosed to justify such interference.—State ex rel. Time, form, and sufficiency of consent

(1) Generally.—State v. Huffman, Mo App., 248 S W. 985—51 C J. p 324 note 51 [c]

(2) In quo warranto case to have school district declared illegal in so far as boundaries included relators' land, fact that complaint contained district attorney's signature in his official capacity sufficiently showed that action was brought with his consent.—State, by Hagglund, ex rel. prosecuting attorney has been held to be arbitrary[28] and uncontrollable,[29] and his refusal to act does not confer on a private person a right to proceed.[30] On the other hand, it has also been held that in an exceptional case the court may in its own discretion authorize a private person to proceed notwithstanding the attorney general's refusal to institute proceedings or consent to their institution by another,[31] and that under statute or rule of court the discretion of the attorney general is not arbitrary,[32] but that on the contrary he is subject to the order of the court to file an information in the nature of quo warranto if the court deems such action in the public interest,[33] and that on refusal of the attorney general to act a private citizen may bring such proceedings where essential to vindicate the public right.[34]

Also, in a case within a statute authorizing the attorney general or state's attorney to institute the proceeding, or apply for leave of court to institute it, at the instance of private persons, if private rights or grievances are involved, the consent of the officer is essential,[35] but he has no arbitrary and uncontrolled discretion;[36] the only discretion vested in him is to determine whether the documents and evidence presented to him are in proper legal form and prima facie sufficient,[37] and, if they are, it is his duty to sign the petition and present it to the court.[38] Indeed, under some statutes making it the mandatory duty of a district attorney to bring suit on request, as discussed in Mandamus § 69 f, it is incumbent on him to present the cause of action to the court in proper form,[39] and he has no right to raise the question that the petition addressed to him does not set forth ultimate facts sufficient to warrant a judgment of ouster.[40] Under statutes authorizing

Necessity that case be exceptional

The district court has discretionary power to grant leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto at the instance of a private relator who has no interest in the matter distinct from that of the general public, notwithstanding the attorney general's refusal to institute or consent to the proceedings, but the case should be exceptional and one in which it clearly appears that the public interests require it, and, where the case is not exceptional, leave should be refused.—State ex rel. Dahl v. Fredrickson, supra.

Grant of leave held unauthorized

Granting of leave to file information in the nature of quo warranto to test an alderman's right to office for the six months remaining in term at time alderman was appointed to fill a vacancy, at instance of one who had no interest distinct from that of the general public, was unauthorized in view of the brief period of the term for which alderman was appointed, the interference with municipal affairs possibly resulting if he were ousted, and, in absence of showing that public interest would be better served by entertaining the proceedings, notwithstanding substantial defect in appointee's title to the office.—State ex rel. Dahl v. Fredrickson, supra.

Grant of leave to town

Supreme court could grant town leave to file information for writ of quo warranto to test propriety of proceeding to include within city limits territory belonging to town, over objections of attorney general. —State ex rel. Town of Stuntz v. City of Chisholm, 266 N.W. 689, 196 Minn. 285.

Sound discretion

Where a claimant of an office lacks power to proceed as of right with proceedings in the nature of quo warranto, it has been held that the matter is addressed to the sound discretion of the attorney general.—Brierly v. Walsh, 12 N.E.3d 827, 299 Mass. 292.

the institution of a quo warranto proceeding by a person who has an interest distinct from that of the public, as discussed infra § 28, such as a right in himself to an office, infra § 30, he may proceed independently on his own relation where the attorney general[41] or prosecuting attorney[42] has consented or has refused to act, or, in some jurisdictions, without either the consent of the attorney general or his refusal to act, where the action is based on the usurpation of an office pertaining to a county, town, city, village, or school district.[43]

Failure of a party who has joined in a quo warranto proceeding to demand of the attorney general or state's attorney that quo warranto proceedings be brought has been held not to deprive the court of jurisdiction to hear the case where no objection is made by defendant.[44]

§ 19. Leave of Court

In a proper case the court may grant leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto

In a proper case the court may, in its discretion, grant leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto [45]

§ 20. —— Necessity

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, leave or permission of court is a condition precedent to the filing of an information or the institution of proceedings in the nature of quo warranto by, or on the relation of, a private citizen, but at common law the attorney general ex officio may institute the proceeding without application to, or leave of, court.

The ancient common-law writ of quo warranto was a writ of right of the crown,[46] but the modern writ, or an information or action in the nature of quo warranto, is not a matter of absolute right,[47] at least where a private citizen seeks to institute the proceeding or to become a relator,[48] and even, it has been held, where the attorney general attacks the legality of the organization of a municipality.[49] In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, leave or permission of court is a condition precedent to the filing of an information or other institution of the proceeding by, or on the relation of, a private citizen [50] At common law and under a number of the statutes the attorney general ex officio may institute the proceeding without application to, or leave of, court,[51] and in at least one jurisdiction it has been held that the proceeding may be instituted

Under statute, a relator who claims title to a municipal office and charges that another unlawfully holds it need not ask leave of supreme court to exhibit an information in nature of a quo warranto in name of attorney general, but may file it as matter of right, and the practice of asking leave is properly invoked where a person, himself a stranger to office, complains that a named respondent usurps or unlawfully holds any office or franchise in the state.—Duncan v. by a private relator without leave of court, where the district attorney consents that the relator may act.[52] Under some code provisions an order of a judge directing the bringing of a quo warranto proceeding is a condition precedent to the bringing of such a proceeding in the name of the state alone without the joinder of an individual relator and without security for costs,[53] but no order or leave of court is necessary where there is an individual relator who gives security for costs.[54]

§ 21. —— Application for Leave and Proceedings Thereon

a. In general
b. Persons entitled to apply for leave
c. Notice and rule to show cause
d. Grant or refusal of leave in general
e. Discretion of court
f. Attack on, and vacation of, order

a. In General

It has been held that application for leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto may properly be made instead of application for issuance of a writ of quo warranto; and ordinarily an application or petition should state facts instead of conclusions, and should be verified or supported by accompanying affidavits.

It has been held that it is proper to apply to the court for leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto,[55] rather than apply to the court to issue a writ of quo warranto.[56] The application should be in statutory form, if any such form is prescribed,[57] and, if not so prescribed, the procedure conformable to common-law usage should be followed.[58] In some states a petition is necessary.[59] The application should be verified or accompanied by affidavits,[60] unless it is made by the attorney general.[61] The petition or affidavits in support thereof should not only recite facts,[62] rather than conclusions,[63] but should also state all the material facts necessary to justify or warrant the granting of leave,[64] and be so framed that perjury may be assigned thereon if any material allegation contained therein is false.[65] Attaching copies of documentary papers relied on as evidence to the petition as exhibits is desirable,[66] but not indispensable.[67]

The filing of an answer to a petition for leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto has been held not to be authorized[68] or required[69] by law. In some jurisdictions the court may, in the

Private right and personal interest
A petition by a private citizen for leave to file an information in nature of quo warranto where attorney general and state's attorney of proper county had refused to institute action must show on its face that plaintiff has an interest that is personal and peculiar to him and how he would be adversely affected if leave to file were not granted.—Adair v. Reasonable belief Probable ground exists for granting leave to file information in nature of quo warranto, where petition alleges facts sufficient to engender reasonable belief that rights, privileges, or offices are being usurped or unlawfully exercised to detriment of public.—People v. exercise of its discretion, hear either the petition alone or affidavits on both sides,[70] but it should not consider affidavits of respondent which merely deny facts alleged in the petition,[71] or which set up facts which are proper subject matter of pleas.[72]

A motion to dismiss the petition on the ground that the averments of the petition do not disclose a prima facie case is in the nature of a demurrer, requiring the court to consider the allegations of the petition as true.[73]

b. Persons Entitled to Apply for Leave

Better practice has been said to require a private citizen first to ask the attorney general to make application to the court for leave to institute quo warranto proceedings, but under some statutes any person having a private interest in the matter involved may make the application.

Although a private citizen may make application for leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto,[74] it has been said to be better practice first to apply to the attorney general to institute the proceedings.[75] Under some statutory provisions application for leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto may be made by "any person interested"[76] The "interest" required must be personal to the relator and other than that of a mere citizen and taxpayer,[77] and under such statutes it is essential that the court be satisfied that applicant is a person interested before it grants leave.[78]

c. Notice and Rule to Show Cause

Ordinarily the court may, on presentation of a proper application, grant an order for the defendant to show cause why an information in the nature of quo warranto should not be filed, and in some, but not other, jurisdictions notice of the application must be given to the defendant.

Except under some code provisions,[79] the court may, on due presentation of a proper application, grant an order or rule on defendant to show cause why an information should not be filed,[80] and in some jurisdictions, on application by a private person for leave to file an information, defendant is entitled to be heard on the question of filing,[81] and the granting of a rule to show cause is a customary preliminary step,[82] unless the subject matter of the proceeding is a small annual office;[83] but in other jurisdictions a rule nisi is not necessary,[84] and the court may, in its discretion, act on the petition ex parte or enter a rule nisi requiring respondent to show cause.[85] Such a rule or order does not determine any question of legal right either as to subject matter or procedure.[86]

Notice. There is considerable diversity of holding as to notice of the application made, or steps taken, to obtain leave to bring a quo warranto proceeding, and it has been variously held in different jurisdictions that notice to defendant is,[87] or is

Admission by defendant

In quo warranto proceeding instituted by individual under statute providing that attorney general or commonwealth's attorney "or any person interested" may in state's name apply for leave to file information in nature of writ of quo warranto, defendant's statement that words "if either refuse or fail to do so" should be interpolated between words "or" and "any" was an admission that statute does not require "any person interested" to request attorney general or commonwealth's attorney to apply for writ as condition precedent to instituting quo warranto proceeding.—Hammer v. Commonwealth ex rel. Hoover, supra.

Interest held sufficiently shown

Relator alleging that he had been legally elected to office of city justice, that he had duly qualified, performed duties, and received emoluments of office, and that he was entitled to continue in office until his successor was legally elected, but that, under color of a void election, defendant had unlawfully ousted him from office, if he was a bona fide claimant and made out a prima facie case, was a "person interested," entitled under statute to apply in name of state for leave to file information in nature of writ of quo warranto.—Hammer v. not,[88] necessary; that notice of an application by a private relator need not be given to the attorney-general;[89] that an application for an order or rule to show cause may be made without notice,[90] but that the rule or order must be served on defendant;[91] and that service of the petition, or a copy thereof, on defendant is necessary.[92]

Return of rule and subsequent proceedings. A rule to show cause may be made returnable at such time as the court shall fix,[93] and its discretion governs the question unless otherwise provided by statute.[94] When a rule to show cause has been entered, respondent may file counter-affidavits.[95] On the hearing, the court may discharge the rule if the affidavits in support thereof are insufficient,[96] or if they are clearly and satisfactorily answered by counter-affidavits;[97] and, where the facts relied on in an answer to the rule are undisputed, and the questions of law presented may be given adequate consideration at the time, the court will determine them.[98] On the other hand, the rule should be made absolute in order that the questions may receive a full and final determination where the facts relied on in answer to the rule are disputed,[99] or where new and doubtful questions of law, requiring more time for their satisfactory solution than can be reasonably given on the application, are presented.[1]

For the purpose of determining a motion by defendant to discharge a rule to show cause why leave should not be granted to file an information in the nature of quo warranto, the facts alleged in the information are admitted to be true.[2]

d. Grant or Refusal of Leave in General

Some authorities hold that in order to justify a grant of leave to institute proceedings for quo warranto or in the nature thereof the applicant must make a showing which is precise and positive, while other authorities hold that a mere showing of probable cause is sufficient.

Some authorities hold that in order to justify a grant of leave to institute proceedings in quo warranto or in the nature thereof applicant must make a precise and positive showing;[3] while other authorities hold that leave should be granted wherever probable cause is shown,[4] at least where no good reason for refusing leave appears.[5] In any event, the matter is ordinarily addressed to the sound discretion of the court, as discussed infra subdivision e of this section.

The court may properly refuse to permit the filing of an information questioning the right or title

Statute changing common-law rule

At common law, leave to bring quo warranto proceeding to inquire into authority by which corporation exercised its franchise was granted on application of attorney general, and the court, in its discretion, directed notice of such application to be given to the corporation or to its officers previous to granting such leave, and the court could hear the corporation in opposition thereto; but, where the common-law proceeding has been abolished by statute, it is not necessary for attorney general to file an application to bring quo warranto proceeding, or to give defendant an opportunity to show cause why proceeding should not be commenced.—State ex rel. Prima facie case

In quo warranto, the moving party must show a prima facie case, and the writ obtained by him may be sustained only if legally supported. Commonwealth ex rel. Margiotti v. Union Traction Co. of Philadelphia, 194 A. 661, 327 Pa. 497.

Denial on pleadings

Order, "On showing made, and considering petition proposed to be filed, leave to file proceeding in nature of quo warranto is denied," was construable as refusing application for leave merely on inspection of pleadings, not as refusal of application because of evidence submitted, and refusal predicated solely on such inspection was improper where the pleadings were sufficient.—Blake v. Middlebrooks, 185 S.E. 786, 182 Ga. 500.

Discretion no excuse for error

Where judgment in quo warranto proceedings in favor of respondent was erroneous, judgment could not be sustained on ground that judge had a discretion to refuse the writ.—Britton v. Bowden, 5 S.E.2d 47, 188 Ga. 806.

of a person to an office where, by virtue of circumstances occurring after the making of the application, he is legally acting in his office when the application is heard and decided[6] An order granting leave to sue to annul a charter should specify the grounds on which the action is to be brought.[7] Permission to bring the action or proceeding may be granted nunc pro tunc[8] An order granting leave is effective according to its terms[9]

Statutes authorizing a judge of a specified court to direct that an action in the nature of quo warranto be brought when he believes that certain facts can be proved have been construed to vest the power in the judge and not in the court to order the solicitor to proceed,[10] and to contemplate that the judge shall have advance information leading him to believe that the charge can be proved[11] and that the proceeding will be for the public good[12] Such a statute has also been held to contemplate that the judge may acquire information in his own way to guide him in making his decision as to whether or not to order the solicitor to proceed.[13]

e. Discretion of Court

An application for leave to institute quo warranto proceedings by filing an information or otherwise is ordinarily addressed to the sound discretion of the court.

Granting or refusing leave to institute a quo warranto proceeding by filing an information or otherwise rests largely in the discretion of the court to which the application is made[14] This is true notwithstanding the existence of a substantial defect in the title by which the office or franchise in question is held,[15] and, on considerations of public policy, the court may deny an application for leave to file an information, although the facts are such that, if the proceeding was entertained, judgment would have to be given against respondent[16] The discretion to be exercised is a sound judicial and legal discretion.[17]

In exercising its discretion, the court may and should consider all the circumstances of the case,[18] the motives of the relator in having the proceeding instituted,[19] the time which has elapsed since the cause of complaint occurred,[20] and whether the public interest will be served by allowing the information to be filed;[21] and it may refuse leave or decline to entertain the proceeding on considerations of public policy, interest, or convenience,[22] because of such conduct on the part of applicants as to preclude them from making the inquiry,[23] because of long, unexcused, and prejudicial delay or acquiescence[24] on the part of the persons complaining[25] or the public generally,[26] or because of the prior institution of actions, proceedings, or contests involving the same questions,[27] or where the term of office in question will expire at an early date[28] and before the questions involved in the proceeding can be tried and decided.[29] In a proceeding brought primarily for the benefit of the relator, the court's discretion is much greater than where purely public interests are involved.[30]

§ 22. Time to Sue, Limitations, Laches, and Estoppel

a. In general
b. Limitations
c. Laches and estoppel

a. In General

Quo warranto proceedings or those in the nature thereof should be timely, and may be dismissed where premature. Ordinarily, the proceeding may not be brought to try title to office before defendant has assumed or usurped such office.

Quo warranto proceedings or those in the nature thereof should be timely,[39] and will be dismissed if brought prematurely.[40] Proceedings to try title to office cannot be brought until defendant or respondent has assumed,[41] usurped,[42] been inducted into,[43] or is in possession of,[44] the office, and therefore cannot be brought before the term of office commences[45] Also, quo warranto to try the title to an office during a particular term cannot ordinarily be begun after the expiration of that term.[46] Even though a person elected for a certain term may be entitled to hold the office after the expiration of the term until his successor is elected and qualified, it is not true that quo warranto will not lie until the successor has qualified,[47] and, where the official holds for a designated period and not until the qualification of his successor, quo warranto may be brought to oust him after expiration of his term, even though his successor has not qualified.[48]

Attack on incorporation proceedings. An action in the nature of quo warranto, raising the question of the validity of proceedings for incorporation of a municipality, is premature when brought after the appointment of commissioners to call and hold, but before the holding of, an election on the question of incorporation,[49] since it is not certain that the proposed corporation will ever be formed.[50]

Time and mode of raising objection The objection that the proceedings are begun too late may in some cases be made on presentation of a petition for leave to file an information,[51] or, if not made at that time, such objection may be raised subsequently by plea or answer.[52]

b. Limitations

A quo warranto proceeding may be barred by limitations.

A quo warranto action or proceeding may be barred by limitation where it is within an applicable statute of limitations;[53] but not otherwise.[54]

c. Laches and Estoppel

Some authorities allow the defense of laches and estoppel to be urged against quo warranto proceedings brought on behalf of the public, while others do not. In any event laches and estoppel may be available to bar a private relator.

It has been held in some jurisdictions that, in the absence of an applicable statute of limitations, mere lapse of time does not estop the people,[55] or bar a quo warranto proceeding by the state, people, or attorney general,[56] even though brought by a public attorney at the instance of a private relator, where the public is in any event interested as such.[57] Also, in such jurisdictions the personal conduct, acquiescence, laches, or estoppel of an individual relator,[58] or even mere neglect by public officers,[59] does not bar or estop the state, public, or attorney general. In other jurisdictions, however, the state or public may be precluded by laches, estoppel, or waiver from maintaining quo warranto proceedings,[60] such as those attacking the organization of a county,[61] or of a municipal corporation,[62] or such

Computation of time

Under the facts disclosed the statute of limitations did not bar quo warranto to test sufficiency of incorporation, because limitations had not yet begun to run, where decree of county court reciting that all proceedings "unto this time" were in accordance with law and ordering publication of notice that incorporation should be denominated an incorporated town "upon the further compliance with the law in such cases made and provided" was insufficient as decree adjudging incorporation to be complete.—Norton v. Jordan v. City of Greenwood, 129 So. 682, 157 Miss. 836.

Ultra vires act

Where appointment of respondent was not made in accordance with statute, laches was no defense in quo warranto proceeding since act questioned was ultra vires act by governmental officer and no hardship was inflicted on respondent.—Haines v. Appleton, 9 A.2d 778, 123 N.J.Law 492.

as those attacking the organization of a private corporation,[63] or the validity of proceedings annexing territory to a school district,[64] and it has been held that, where the state, through its own agents, assumed the superintendence of subscriptions to the capital stock of a corporation, it cannot, in quo warranto proceedings, charge the corporation with the mala fides of the agents.[65]

At any rate, estoppel or laches may bar a private relator[66] from attacking the validity of an election;[67] and acquiescence,[68] or unreasonable delay,[69] on the part of a private relator may preclude him from maintaining a quo warranto proceeding. On the other hand, there is no estoppel or laches against either a private or a public relator where the facts do not disclose such acquiescence, recognition, or lapse of time as to constitute an estoppel or unreasonable delay.[70]

Private corporation usurping municipal powers

While laches is equity doctrine, in proper case, it may be applied to municipal corporations in quo warranto proceedings, such as those seeking to oust a private company from usurping municipal privileges —State ex inf. Proceeding brought in name of state

Fact that quo warranto, questioning validity of incorporation of municipality and legality of acts of officials, is brought in name of state does not preclude municipality from setting up acquiescence in exercise of corporate jurisdiction and powers —State ex rel. Laches of state

In this connection, it has been said that the charge of laches is against the state rather than against a private person as relator, and that, even though the latter is not guilty of laches, he may be barred by those of the state.—State on Inf. of Wallach ex rel. Four months' delay

Citizens were not entitled to quo warranto to have nominating election invalidated on ground that more than half of voters were not qualified because of failure to register and pay poll tax, where citizens were guilty of laches in waiting over four months, and until less than one month before general election before seeking relief.—State ex rel. Reasonable diligence

Where building inspector of the city was dismissed without charges being filed or a hearing accorded him and promptly appealed to civil service commission and, when his status there was determined to be that of an officer in the unclassified service, instituted quo warranto suit to test successor's right to office, he moved with reasonable diligence and was not in laches.—Pellegrino v. Evans, 43 A.2d 269, 133 N.J.Law 159.

Organization of school district

Fact that a school-house site has been selected, contracts for work and material made, bonds issued and sold, and a teacher engaged does not operate as an estoppel against a proceeding by information in the nature of a quo warranto against school directors to test the legality of the organization of a school district, where it does not appear that the bonds were sold or the money expended before the filing of the information, and the hiring of the teacher was done after that time.—Mason v. People, 56 N.E. 1069, 185 Ill. 302.

§ 23. Defenses to, and Abatement or Dismissal of, Proceeding

a. In general
b. Abatement or dismissal of proceeding

a. In General

The availability of various matters as defenses to quo warranto proceedings has been judicially determined.

The availability of various matters as defenses to quo warranto proceedings has been judicially determined.[71] Accordingly, in a quo warranto proceeding instituted by the state the doctrine of waiver may be appealed to and applied in defense,[72] and considerations of public interest may operate as a defense to bar relief.[73] The fact that irregularities in an election did not affect the result will afford a good defense to a quo warranto proceeding attacking such election,[74] and the illegality of votes cast for a claimant of an office may constitute a defense to a quo warranto proceeding brought by him.[75] However, the facts that a certificate of election has been issued to the incumbent of an office,[76] and that he has taken the oath of office,[77] and assumed the duties thereof,[78] do not prevent an inquiry into his title.

If the incumbent prevents his successor from qualifying by unlawfully detaining his certificate and commission, he will not be allowed to set up his right to hold over as a defense to quo warranto proceedings,[79] and thereby reap a benefit from his own wrong.[80] An incumbent may not assert as a defense the invalidity of a statute under which he was declared elected and under which he assumed the duties of office.[81] An agreement by defendant corporation with a borough is not a defense to proceedings by the state to forfeit defendant's charter.[82]

Where quo warranto is filed against a corporation on the ground that it acted as trustee without legal authority to do so, the fact that the efforts of the corporation in construction of buildings were beneficial to the state affords no defense.[83] Failure to make due protest before the council of an annexing town does not afford a defense to a proceeding by the relator in quo warranto to attack the annexation of territory, where such annexation was made in violation of the fundamental requirements of the statute governing annexation.[84] In the absence of estoppel, accumulation of costs in carrying out illegal proceedings is not ground for denying relief under an information in the nature of quo warranto.[85] Where a statute expressly provides a method of filling vacancies, a claim that, if the incumbent is ousted, the resultant vacancy cannot be filled is without merit.[86]

In accordance with the practice in some jurisdictions, where the attorney general institutes quo warranto proceedings to oust a foreign corporation of its privilege to do business in the state, the rule is to issue the writ as applied for in the first instance and put respondent to a showing by plea or answer why it should not be ousted.[87] Where a quo warranto proceeding is brought against a foreign corporation on the grounds that it is transacting business within the state without authority, proof that defendant had obtained a certificate of authority from the proper state official is a complete defense.[88]

71. Removal of ineligibility
The fact that the ineligibility of defendant to hold office had ceased before the institution of the proceeding constituted a valid defense. —State ex rel. Hawthorne v. Wiseheart, 28 So.2d 589, 158 Fla. 267.

b. Abatement or Dismissal of Proceeding

(1) In general

(2) Withdrawal from office or expiration of term

(1) In General

A motion to quash the writ or dismiss the proceeding should be sustained where the writ was improvidently granted, and it is ground for abatement or dismissal that the officer or person filing the information was without right or authority to do so.

A motion to quash the writ or dismiss the proceeding should be sustained where the writ was improvidently granted[89] It is ground for abatement or dismissal that the officer or person filing the information was without right or authority to do so,[90] and it has been held that a motion to quash a writ of quo warranto, or one in the nature thereof, is well taken only where there was no authority for bringing the proceeding,[91] and that, where the information and answer present issues of fact, it is improper to dismiss the proceeding.[92] Failure to file security for costs may constitute ground for quashing a writ and dismissing the proceedings.[93] In original quo warranto proceedings in an appellate court, the appellate court may dismiss the proceedings with leave to file copies of the pleadings for trial of the issues in a lower court.[94] The fact that the relator, an attorney, violated a canon of professional ethics in prosecuting the case affords no ground for dismissal of the proceeding.[95]

Pendency of another action. The general rules as to the pendency of another action as ground for abatement, as discussed in Abatement and Revival §§ 17–81, govern in quo warranto proceedings,[96] and the pendency of another proceeding is Discretion to grant or dismiss application see supra § 6.

Respondents clearly entitled to office

Trial court properly vacated ex parte order issuing writ of quo warranto directing respondents to show by what warrant they claimed the right to act as trustees of religious corporation where it conclusively appeared from the petition, writ, and affidavits filed that respondents were in fact and law such trustees and that hence the writ had been improvidently issued.—Dollenmayer v. Ryder, 286 N.W 297, 205 Minn 207.

Issuance of writ in vacation

Petition in quo warranto proceeding to command public utility to show its authority and claim to rights, privileges, and franchises in operating plant was held not so positive as to public necessity or as to irreparable injury as to justify issuance of writ in vacation on grounds of threatening of great and irreparable injury.—State ex rel McKittrick v. Missouri Service Co., Mo App., 102 S.W.2d 675.

Commonwealth not entitled to assert forfeiture

In quo warranto proceeding for forfeiture of charters of railway and traction companies, court properly sustained motion to quash, as against contention that motion to quash did not lie, and that there was no alternative but to demur, answer, or plead, where suggestion showed that commonwealth was not entitled to assert forfeiture.—Commonwealth ex rel. Margiotti v. Union Traction Co. of Philadelphia, 194 A 661, 327 Pa. 497.

Issues of law and fact

Canon of ethics not involved

Where issue in quo warranto proceeding was whether defendant was disqualified to hold the office of school commissioner, supreme court was without authority to dismiss proceeding on alleged ground that relator violated canon of professional ethics as a lawyer in prosecuting case, since canon of ethics was not involved.—Attorney General ex rel Wendrow v. Knapp, supra

Dismissal refused

Proceeding in nature of quo warranto to require telephone company to remove equipment from streets of city would not be dismissed on ground that similar information was pending in circuit court and that city did not authorize attorney general to file information in supreme court, where proceeding in circuit court was dismissed on day following filing of information in supreme court and aldermen of city passed resolution ratifying action of attorney general.—State ex inf McKittrick ex rel. City of Lebanon v. Missouri not ground for abatement where there is a lack of identity of parties or issues, or both.[97]

Unauthorized substitution of attorneys of record for plaintiff does not abate or discontinue the action.[98]

Death of private relator or complainant terminates the proceeding, and it will be dismissed.[99]

Moot or speculative case. A quo warranto proceeding may be dismissed where it is moot,[1] and a proceeding brought for the sole purpose of obtaining a determination as to who has the power of appointment to an office will be dismissed where the relator and respondent have no real dispute and the occupant will remain in office whatever may be the decision.[2] Also, the case will be dismissed where the controversy has become moot by reason of circumstances occurring subsequent to the institution of the suit,[3] and quo warranto to test the validity of a statute will be dismissed where the statute is repealed pending the action.[4] Moreover, quo warranto will not lie to prevent a purely speculative occurrence.[5]

Regarded as demurrer. A motion to dismiss an action in the nature of quo warranto may properly be treated as a demurrer,[6] and on a motion to quash the writ the facts alleged in the information are deemed to be admitted.[7]

Voluntary dismissal or motion to dismiss. Where a quo warranto suit is brought in the name of the state on relation of an individual and other persons are added as relators by amendment, a subsequent motion of the original relator for a dismissal of the suit, while sufficient as a withdrawal of such relator from the suit,[8] does not work a discontinuance.[9]

Dismissal by, or on order of, attorney general or district attorney. At common law the attorney general may dismiss the proceeding if, in the discharge of his official duty, he deems it proper to do so.[10] Under statute it has been held that a county attorney who has the right to file an information in the nature of quo warranto is not required to dismiss it on the order of the attorney general despite the latter's general supervisory control of county attorneys.[11] On the other hand, it has also been held that the attorney general may dismiss such a proceeding over the objections of the rela-

tor,[12] although there is also authority to the contrary.[13] Where both public and private interests are involved, it has been held that a district attorney who has previously consented to the bringing of quo warranto may not block further prosecution by an arbitrary motion to dismiss where no legal ground exists for dismissal.[14]

(2) Withdrawal from Office or Expiration of Term

Ordinarily the defendant's voluntary withdrawal from office while quo warranto proceedings are pending, or the expiration of his term, justifies dismissal of the proceedings; but under some circumstances the proceeding may survive, as where damages are sought

Ordinarily proceedings for quo warranto, or in the nature thereof, are abated and may be dismissed where, after commencement of such proceedings, defendant voluntarily withdraws from the office,[15] or his appointment or election thereto is declared void,[16] or his term expires pending such proceedings,[17] and, where no substantial benefit would inure to plaintiff, the proceedings will not be continued merely to try the abstract title to the office.[18] On the other hand, respondent's surrender or renunciation of, or withdrawal from, the office after the institution of the proceeding does not necessarily abate it or require its dismissal,[19] and in an otherwise proper case a quo warranto action or proceeding commenced during the term of office in question may, after the expiration thereof, be tried[20] and prosecuted to final judgment,[21] where the ousting of defendant is not the sole object of the proceeding,[22] and it has been held that the proceeding may be continued where necessary for the recovery of damages or costs which plaintiff has sustained or incurred because of the wrongful assumption of authority.[23]

Abandonment of office by relator. Where the relator is a claimant of the office in controversy, his voluntary abandonment of the office and surrender thereof to respondent, while the action is still pending and undetermined, amounts to an abandonment of the action,[24] and the point that the relator's abandonment of the office resulted from his misapprehension of the facts will not enable him to maintain quo warranto.[25]

Flynn v. Ellis, supra.

§ 24. Jurisdiction and Venue

a. Jurisdiction
b. Venue

a. Jurisdiction

(1) In general
(2) Lower courts
(3) Appellate courts

(1) In General

Constitutional and statutory provisions ordinarily control in respect of what courts have jurisdiction of proceedings in the nature of quo warranto.

In order to ascertain what courts may take jurisdiction of proceedings by quo warranto, reference must be had to the organic law and statutes of the state.[26] The attorney general cannot, by consent, confer on a court jurisdiction which it does not possess under the constitution or statutes.[27] Where lack of jurisdiction is urged on the ground that a necessary party was not a legal entity when the proceeding was begun, such contention will be overruled where it appears that such party had become a legal entity at the time when the objection was raised.[28] The exclusive character of quo warranto as a remedy is discussed supra § 4.

Criminal jurisdiction. In some jurisdictions an information in the nature of quo warranto has been held criminal in form to the extent that matters of jurisdiction are governed by the rules applicable to criminal proceedings.[29] In other jurisdictions, however, it has been held that, in the absence of the imposition of a fine, a proceeding by information is not criminal, or quasi-criminal, to the extent that no valid action can be taken in it out of term.[30]

Effect of prayer for judgment. In a jurisdiction wherein the judgment in quo warranto proceedings against the incumbent of an office must be limited to an ouster from office, as discussed infra § 49, the fact that the petition prays not only for the ouster of respondent from the office but also that the relator be put in possession thereof does not affect the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the proceeding.[31]

Judge. The court, rather than the judge, hears proceedings in quo warranto,[32] and, unless expressly authorized by statute to do so,[33] a judge out of court cannot issue a writ of quo warranto,[34] or grant leave to file such an information in the nature of quo warranto.[35]

(2) Lower Courts

Lower courts of general and original jurisdiction, such as the district, circuit, or superior courts, are ordinarily accorded jurisdiction of quo warranto proceedings or those in the nature thereof.

District, circuit, superior, common pleas, and other like courts of original and general jurisdiction are vested with jurisdiction of quo warranto proceedings.[36] This is true not only under constitutional or statutory provisions expressly conferring jurisdiction of quo warranto proceedings,[37] but also under the construction placed on general provisions conferring jurisdiction on such courts.[38] Where jurisdiction of claims to office is not expressly or impliedly placed elsewhere, as discussed in Elections § 247 b, and Officers §§ 79, 80, it has been held that a lower court of general jurisdiction has residuary jurisdiction under the constitution irrespective of whether actions are termed election contests, proceedings in the nature of quo warranto, or suits to oust usurpers.[39]

The jurisdiction of such courts extends, on the one hand, and is restricted on the other hand, to the political division for which they are established,[40] unless, by statute, they are given jurisdiction throughout the state in cases wherein the state or commonwealth is plaintiff.[41] Inferior courts, and those of limited jurisdiction, such as city courts, do not usually have jurisdiction of quo warranto proceedings,[42] although it may be conferred on them by constitutional or statutory provisions.[43]

Proceedings involving state office. Quo warranto proceedings involving the right or title to a state office are within the jurisdiction of district, superior, or common pleas courts under the constitutional provisions of some,[44] but not other,[45] states.

Discretion of attorney general. Under statute it has been held that a quo warranto proceeding may be brought either in the district court or in the supreme court as determined by the attorney general.[46]

(3) Appellate Courts

Appellate courts may have original jurisdiction of proceedings in quo warranto or in the nature thereof, but will ordinarily decline to exercise it where a lower court possesses concurrent jurisdiction.

Under constitutional or statutory provisions original jurisdiction of proceedings in quo warranto, or in the nature thereof, may be conferred on appellate courts.[47] The exercise of such jurisdiction is not always mandatory,[48] and ordinarily the court will decline to exercise it unless some good reason is shown for not making an application to a lower court possessing concurrent jurisdiction,[49] and it will also decline to exercise it where a substantially similar, although technically different, cause, involving the same matters, is pending in a lower court.[50] On the other hand, where a speedy determination seems desirable and it appears that, if the case were referred to a lower court, it would in any event come before the appellate court on review, the appellate court may exercise its original jurisdiction to entertain a proceeding in quo warranto by the state in the public interest to oust one usurping a state office.[51]

b. Venue

A proceeding in quo warranto or in the nature thereof should be brought in the place designated by statute.

Quo warranto proceedings or those in the nature thereof should be brought in the place designated by statute,[52] which may be the county of defendant's residence,[53] or that in which the duties of the office involved are performed,[54] or the county in which a school district is located,[55] or, where a court has state wide jurisdiction, venue may be laid in any county wherein such court is sitting.[56] In the absence of exceptions relating to quo warranto, the general statutes of the state with respect to venue will control.[57]

Change of venue may be made in a proper case in quo warranto proceedings or those in the nature thereof,[58] and a change of venue will, in some jurisdictions, be allowed in such proceedings brought for the protection of the rights of a private person.[59] However, if the supreme court has specified a county for the trial of an issue of fact, the general law as to a change of venue does not apply.[60] Statutes relating to a change of venue in criminal cases do not apply to quo warranto [61]

§ 25. Plaintiffs, Petitioners, and Relators

The person on whose complaint, or at whose instance, an information or writ of quo warranto is filed, and who is quasi the plaintiff, is called the relator.

The person on whose complaint, or at whose instance, an information or writ of quo warranto is filed, and who is quasi the plaintiff in the proceeding, is known as the relator [62]

The question as to who may make an application for leave, in connection with quo warranto proceedings, is discussed supra § 21 b.

§ 26. —— Government or People

Except where statutes permit proceedings in the name of the attorney general or a private individual, quo warranto proceedings must be in the name of the state or people, or, in some cases, the United States.

Except where the case falls within a statute authorizing the action or proceeding to be brought in the name of the attorney general, as discussed infra § 27, or a private individual, as discussed infra § 28, a quo warranto action or proceeding may and must be brought and carried on in the name of the state or commonwealth,[63] or the people thereof,[64] or, in some cases, in the name or at the instance of the United States [65] However, under some circumstances the state may be a nominal, or only a formal, party, rather than the real party in interest,[66] as where the proceeding involves the title to an office in a private corporation, as discussed infra § 30.

§ 27. —— Attorney General or Prosecuting Attorney

The attorney general or, in some jurisdictions, a local prosecuting attorney or similar officer may generally bring a quo warranto action on behalf of the state; in some jurisdictions such authority is exclusive. Such officer may ordinarily direct and control the proceedings.

Generally speaking, the attorney general may bring an action or proceeding in the nature of quo warranto, or apply for leave to do so, on behalf of the state,[67] and he may do so ex officio on his own information or relation without naming any

The Declaratory Judgment Law does not dispense with the requirement that a suit in the nature of quo warranto proceedings be brought in the name of the state; suit for a declaratory judgment determining and declaring the rights of two candidates seeking office and for an interpretation of meaning of statute as to election was clearly a suit in the nature of "quo warranto" proceedings and was not maintainable where not brought in the name of the state by the district attorney general.—Jones v. other person as relator,[68] or he may act at the instance or on the complaint, relation, or information, of a private person.[69] Also, in a number of jurisdictions,[70] although not in all,[71] a local prosecuting attorney or other similar officer has power to act on behalf of the state in quo warranto proceedings, provided he is an officer of the county or district in which the wrong was committed and the proceeding is instituted.[72] Whether the attorney general may act in a case in which a prosecuting attorney or other like officer may act depends on the construction of the statutes of the particular jurisdiction, it being held in some jurisdictions that he may,[73] and in others that he may not.[74]

Exclusive authority. At common law, no one but the law officers of the crown could sue out a writ of quo warranto,[75] and it has been variously said that the public prosecutor or attorney general had the exclusive right or power to commence proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto[76] and that the matter of instituting quo warranto proceedings was a prerogative of the attorney general.[77] Likewise, under the construction placed on the constitutional or statutory provisions of some jurisdictions a quo warranto proceeding cannot be instituted in any case by any person other than the attorney general, or state's attorney, or a similar district or county officer;[78] but under the statutes of other jurisdictions quo warranto proceedings may be instituted by private persons in some cases, as discussed infra §§ 28, 30.

The purpose of the requirement that a quo warranto proceeding be brought in the name of the state by the district attorney general is to subserve the public interest, since such a suit is regarded as that of the state.—Jones v. Talley, supra.—Weaver v. Maxwell, 224 S W 2d 832, 189 Tenn. 183

Authority of legislature
Under a constitutional provision that an action of quo warranto must be brought by attorney general or district or county attorney, legislature has no constitutional power to authorize action to be brought by any other person without one of such officers.—Adamson v. Connally, Tex Civ App, 112 S W 2d 287.

Enforcement of public right
A proceeding in the nature of quo warranto to enforce a public right cannot be brought without intervention of the attorney general.—Black v. Cummings, 5 A 2d 858, 62 R.I. 361.

general or other officer authorized to act on behalf of the state may direct and control the proceedings on an information in the nature of quo warranto,[80] but in at least one jurisdiction this is not true where the information is filed on the request, or at the relation, of private persons.[81]

§ 28. —— Private Persons

A private person may bring quo warranto proceedings only where a statute authorizes him to do so; such statutes are generally construed to require that he have a special interest distinct from that of the public.

Unless the case is within a statute authorizing him to do so,[82] and leave of court, if necessary in the particular jurisdiction, is obtained, as discussed supra § 20, a private person cannot bring a quo warranto action or proceeding[83] in his own name,[84] or in the name of the state,[85] attorney general, or prosecuting attorney,[86] independently of the attorney general or prosecuting attorney,[87] but he may call the wrong in question to the attention of,[88] and furnish aid to,[89] the attorney general or other proper officer, and where for all practical purposes the suit is one by the attorney general in behalf of the people, the fact that the name of an individual is added as a relator is not fatal.[90] However, it has been declared that when the enforcement of a public right is sought, the people are the real party to the cause, and the relator need not show that he has any real or personal interest in it.[91]

Under the statutes in a number of jurisdictions, the institution of a quo warranto proceeding by a private person is authorized.[92] Regardless of the variance in their language, the statutes are generally construed not to authorize the institution or maintenance of a quo warranto action or proceeding by a private person unless, according to the decisions, he has a special[93] or personal[94] or peculiar[95] interest[96] which is distinct from that of the public,[97] in the subject matter of the action or proceeding; but, as stated infra § 30 b (1) (a), there is a conflict of authority on the question whether a quo warranto proceeding to try title to a public office may be instituted by a private citizen without any special interest in the office.

A proceeding on the relation of an individual who makes himself a party is pursuant to authority conferred by the state,[98] and the purpose is the same as in a proceeding by the state on the relation of a public officer designated for the purpose.[99]

Control of proceedings. In so far as the public interests are concerned, a private relator or individual cannot control a quo warranto action or proceeding,[1] or, at least he has no absolute right to do so,[2] and he cannot stipulate away the rights of other interested persons.[3] At common law, the relator in an information cannot take any step in the cause in his own name independently of the attorney general.[4]

§ 29. —— Corporations or Associations

A private corporation possessed of a special interest in the subject matter of the inquiry may be a relator in a quo warranto proceeding

When possessed of a special interest in the subject matter of the inquiry, a private corporation may be a relator in a quo warranto proceeding.[5] Where a proceeding is brought by the attorney general in the name of the people, a further recital in the complaint that the proceeding is brought on the information and complaint of a named association does not make the association plaintiff[6] or sustain a contention that the relator has no legal capacity to sue.[7]

The right of a municipality to be plaintiff or the relator in proceedings involving the right or franchise of private corporations to use city streets is discussed infra § 30 c (2).

Purpose of statute
Under the statute, there is a fundamental distinction between a proceeding to protect purely public interests involving no individual rights differing from those of the general public and a proceeding brought on relation of an individual citizen to enforce a private right in which citizen has a purely individual and substantial interest, differing from that of the general public, and in which the interest or concern of the state may be small or entirely theoretical; the purpose of statute authorizing proceeding by an individual was to make it possible for individual wronged in his private right to have writ on his own relation, and statute was not intended to give individual right to the writ to correct a wrong common to the public.—Rowan v. Unlawful practice of profession The right of a citizen to use the name of the state in prosecuting an information in the nature of quo warranto against one who intrudes into a profession without a license has been held purely statutory,[11] and it has been held that proceedings against persons engaging in the unlawful practice of law should be had in the name of the state and be instituted in the manner designated by the quo warranto statute.[12]

(a) In General

A quo warranto proceeding to try title to public office may generally be brought by the attorney general or a prosecuting attorney; under some statutes a person may bring the action where his interest is merely that of a citizen, voter, or taxpayer, but others require that he have a special interest, different from that of the general public, in the office in question.

A quo warranto action or proceeding to try title to a public office may be brought by the attorney general or a prosecuting or district attorney[13] on his own information,[14] relation,[15] or motion,[16] or on the complaint, information, or relation of a private person.[17] Also, under the statutes of most jurisdictions, and the construction placed thereon,

Necessity of intervention of attorney general

Intervention of attorney general in filing of petition in nature of quo warranto to determine right to public office is necessary unless the facts stated in the petition and the relief sought thereby are such that the petition is, in the judgment of the supreme court, a proper one to be filed and heard on its merits even though not signed by the attorney general.—Black v. son or officer other than the attorney general or a prosecuting attorney to institute and maintain the action or proceeding it is necessary that he shall have some special or particular interest, different from that of the public generally, in the office in question,[22] or that he shall claim, or show himself, to be entitled to the office,[23] and that there shall be some prima facie valid ground for his claim.[24]

Defeated candidate Unless, by reason of ineligibility or otherwise, a defeated candidate for an office is not entitled to it in any event,[25] he has an interest sufficient to warrant him in bringing quo warranto proceedings to try the title of the incumbent.[26]

Quo warranto proceeding attacking the legal existence of an office cannot be instituted by a private relator.[27]

Control of action or proceeding Under statutes allowing a claimant of an office to bring the action,

Suit to have election adjudged void in order to redress a public wrong was in the nature of a quo warranto proceeding which would have to be brought on relation of the state and was not maintainable at instance of a private citizen.--Skelton v. Barnett, 227 S.W.2d 774, 190 Tenn. 70.

Lack of election certificate and regular nomination
One who has no certificate of election to a state office from the state canvassing board is not entitled to quo warranto to test the title of an incumbent appointee thereto; quo warranto for such purpose would not lie on behalf of one who was not regularly nominated, who had received only eighty-seven of about a million votes cast in the general election held eight days after the vacancy occurred, and who received no certificate of election.--State ex rel. Right to maintain action exclusively in attorney general in official public capacity.--McCarthy v. Walter, 156 A. 772, 108 N.J.Law 282.

he alone may control it;[28] but where the action is brought by the state at the instance of some interested individual, the control of the proceedings on the trial and on appeal has been held to be vested exclusively in the designated officers of the state.[29] The attorney general's appearance in an action to determine the title to an office does not exclude the relator from control over the action where a substituted petition, stating that the relator appeared in person and by the attorney general, was filed by leave of court and the attorney general made no move to exclude the relator.[30] A private person cannot prosecute an information against a judge unless the proceeding is directed by the attorney general or other authorized official.[31]

It has been declared that the state is concerned only with the usurpation, and takes no part in the controversy further than to have the office declared vacant and the usurper ousted.[32]

(b) Name in Which Action Brought

Apart from statutes having a different effect, a quo warranto proceeding to try title to public office must ordinarily be brought in the name of the state, or attorney general, or in the name of the United States where a federal or territorial office is involved.

Ordinarily, a quo warranto action or proceeding to try title to a public office may and must be brought in the name of the state or commonwealth,[33] or of the attorney general,[34] or in the name of the United States where a federal[35] or territorial[36] office is involved. However, where there is a statute so providing, and the case is within it a claimant of the office may[37] and must[38] bring the action in his own name; and in at least one jurisdiction it is held that, in the absence of a statute specifically covering the matter, a citizen and taxpayer may bring the action in his own name.[39]

(2) Office in Association or Private Corporation

Authorities differ as to whether a quo warranto action to try title to an office in a private corporation or association may be brought by a private person, and, if so, whether he must be one having a personal interest in the office.

In some jurisdictions, a quo warranto action or proceeding to try title to an office in a private corporation may be instituted by,[40] and only by,[41] the attorney general or state's attorney, but such officer may act on the complaint of a director or stockholder[42] and the state may be only a nominal party, rather than the real party, in interest.[43] In other jurisdictions the action or proceeding may be instituted by a private person interested in the corporation or association,[44] such as a stockholder,[45]

including a person who claims to have been elected to the office,[46] but it has been held that a member of an association, in order to be a relator, need not be seeking the same office,[47] although under other authority quo warranto to determine the title to a corporate office may be brought only by a person claiming title thereto and out of possession thereof.[48]

Also, in some jurisdictions a quo warranto action or proceeding to try the right or title to an office in a club, society, or fraternal order may be brought by a member.[49] In other jurisdictions, however, the action or proceeding may not be brought by a mere member,[50] but only by a person having a personal interest in the office by reason of having been legally elected thereto;[51] and in still other jurisdictions the action may not be brought by a claimant of the office.[52]

A corporation itself may not bring quo warranto to determine the title to corporate offices.[53]

c. Attack on Corporate Existence, Franchise, or Action

(1) Public corporation
(2) Private corporation

(1) Public Corporation

The attorney general or prosecuting attorney may institute a quo warranto action to test the validity of the organization of a public corporation or question its exercise of corporate powers, and he must control the proceeding; in most jurisdictions such a proceeding cannot be instituted by a private person interested only as a citizen or taxpayer.

The attorney general, state's attorney, or prosecuting attorney of the proper county or district, may file, or ask leave to file, an information in the nature of quo warranto to test the validity of the organization of a municipal or other public corporation or to question its exercise of corporate powers,[54] and, except in some jurisdictions,[55] or, it has been held, in exceptional cases,[56] such an information cannot be filed, or such action or proceeding otherwise instituted, by a private person whose only interest is that of a citizen, resident, or taxpayer.[57]

Also, the action or proceeding may and must be under the control or supervision of the attorney general or prosecuting attorney, rather than that of a private citizen,[58] but it has been held that if the suit is in fact conducted by the proper officer, it is no objection that a private person is named as relator,[59] and that a proceeding wherein the state's attorney appears as relator is none the less public in nature because individuals interested have employed counsel at their own expense to assist in prosecuting the suit.[60]

Where a new or consolidated school district embraces part or all of the territory of an old district, a director of the old district,[61] but not the old district itself,[62] may be a relator in a quo warranto action or proceeding to test the legality of the formation of the new district.

(2) Private Corporation

Except where statutes so provide, a proceeding to forfeit a private corporation's charter or oust it from the exercise of powers not conferred by law should be instituted by the appropriate officer on behalf of the state and not by a private person.

Ordinarily a quo warranto proceeding to oust individuals from exercising franchises and privileges of a corporation without authority of law,[63] to forfeit or vacate the charter of a private corporation,[64] or to oust it from the exercise of powers or franchises not conferred by, or contrary to, law,[65] may and should be instituted by the attorney general or other appropriate officer, ex officio, on behalf of the state, and not by a private citizen or relator,[66]

(2) Quo warranto proceeding to forfeit right and franchise of foreign corporation to do business throughout state was on behalf of general public of entire state and could be brought only by attorney general and district attorney may institute such proceeding only where exercise of corporate functions is limited by charter or the nature of powers conferred by charter to a certain county or judicial district, it was the duty of trial court to determine from the face of the proceeding the legal capacity of district attorney to appear for the state in such proceeding and unless he had such authority trial court was without jurisdiction to render any judgment binding either on state or corporation, except a judgment of dismissal without prejudice; court had no jurisdiction of proceeding instituted by district attorney to forfeit right and franchise of theater corporation to do business throughout the state, although judgment limited relief to cancellation of right and franchise to operate theaters in a certain city on Sunday.—Kennington-Saenger Theatres v. State as plaintiff

(1) In such a proceeding, the state is the plaintiff, and not the attorney general, who is supposed to be impartial and to seek only the vindication of the rights of the state.—State ex rel. Mitchell v. Sage Stores Co., 143 P.2d 652, 157 Kan. 622, affirmed 65 S.Ct. 9, 323 U.S. 32, 89 L.Ed. 25.

Statute held constitutional

Statute authorizing quo warranto proceedings by attorney general when fraternal benefit society is exceeding its powers, etc., and providing that proceedings not brought by him shall not be entertained, is constitutional.—Delaney v. Grand Lodge A.O.U.W. of Massachusetts, 138 N.E. 918, 244 Mass. 556

Failure to recognize insurance commissioner

Attorney general is not authorized to commence quo warranto proceeding without recognition of insurance commissioner to correct delinquencies of life insurer in conducting its business.—State ex rel. Boynton v. Kansas Life Ins. Co., 36 P.2d 88, 140 Kan. 267

Suit against insolvent foreign corporation

Attorney general had authority, at request of insurance commissioners, to bring in state's name suit in nature of quo warranto against insolvent foreign insurance company which had permitted state license to expire and was disposing of property to prejudice of state policyholders.—Fire Protection Co. of America v. State, Tex.Civ.App., 59 S.W.2d 888.

particularly one who has no interest in the corporation;[67] but where the parties have treated an information as properly filed on behalf of a private relator, the court will so consider it,[68] and in an effort to prevent usurpation of its delegated power to grant a franchise, it is not improper for a municipality to be relator in a quo warranto proceeding.[69]

Some statutes authorize a person to institute a quo warranto proceeding in his own name where his private right or interest has been injured or is put in hazard by the exercise of a franchise or privilege not conferred by law, by a private corporation or by persons claiming to be a private corporation;[70] under the statutes of at least one jurisdiction, any person who gives security for costs may be a relator;[71] and it has been held that the corporation itself is a proper relator where the object of the proceeding is to oust individual respondents from exercising corporate franchises usurped by them.[72]

Control of action. Where an action is instituted by the attorney general to forfeit defendant's corporate charter and franchise at the request of an individual as relator, the latter is the real party in interest,[73] and controls the action.[74]

Right to use city streets. In some jurisdictions the right or franchise of a private corporation to use city streets cannot be attacked in quo warranto proceedings by the municipality[75] or a private individual,[76] but in other jurisdictions the municipality may be plaintiff or the relator,[77] an individual may be the relator in a proceeding brought by the public prosecutor,[78] or a citizen owning property abutting on the street in question may maintain the action on the refusal of the county attorney to act.[79]

The legislative body of a municipality may be empowered by statute to bring an action in quo warranto against the unlawful holding or exercise of a franchise.[80]

§ 31. —— Joinder

Joinder, as relators, of persons possessing like interests may be proper. An aggrieved private citizen may or must join with the state or attorney general under some statutes.

The joinder as relators, in quo warranto proceedings, of persons possessing like interests may be proper,[81] but unnecessary.[82] While several persons claiming different offices ordinarily cannot join in one proceeding,[83] such joinder is proper where the rights of such persons depend on the same matters or questions of law or fact.[84] A mere desire on the part of persons who voted for the relator that he hold the office in question does not constitute such a direct legal interest as to make them necessary parties to the litigation.[85]

Joinder with state or attorney general. In at least one jurisdiction the joinder of an aggrieved private citizen with the attorney general as a corelator is unnecessary,[86] but under the code or statutory provisions of other jurisdictions the informant or person interested may and must join with the state or people as plaintiff.[87] In an information by the attorney general against a corporation, private persons cannot join for the purpose of trying their rights to offices in the corporation.[88]

§ 32. Defendants or Respondents

a. In general
b. Proceedings relating to corporations or associations
c. Proceedings to try title to office

a. In General

The proper parties defendant or respondent in quo warranto proceedings are determined by the language of the statute.

The statute providing for the action of quo warranto may prescribe who the defendants may be.[89] It has been held that no joinder of defendants is proper which unites separate causes of action against several defendants,[90] but, under statute, it has been held that a plaintiff in quo warranto may join as many defendants as may be desired,[91] and that any person may be joined as a defendant whom it may be necessary to make a party for the complete determination or settlement of any questions involved, or against whom a liability is asserted, either jointly, severally, or in the alternative, arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions, regardless of the number of causes of action joined.[92] The filing of a petition under a statute relating to a quo warranto proceeding has been held not, of itself, to make defendant a party to the proceeding.[93]

b. Proceedings Relating to Corporations or Associations

In most jurisdictions a quo warranto proceeding to question the existence of a corporation as never legally organized should be brought against the individuals claiming to exercise the franchise, not the corporation; but in a proceeding complaining that a corporation, legally organized, has ceased to exist, has forfeited its franchise, or has usurped powers or franchise beyond its charter, the corporation itself is the proper defendant.

A proceeding in quo warranto against a corporation has been held to admit the corporate existence,[94] and in many jurisdictions a quo warranto proceeding instituted for the purpose of questioning the existence of a public or private corporation on the ground that it was never legally organized may and should be brought against the individuals who claim the right to exercise the corporate franchise, and not against the corporation itself,[95] which is not a necessary party to the proceeding,[96] but in a number of jurisdictions it has been held by the courts that the pretended or de facto corporation, in its assumed corporate name, is a proper party defendant,[97] and by force of statute, a municipal or public corporation may be a necessary party defendant in quo warranto proceedings to test the validity of the election by which it was organized.[98] Where the ground of complaint is that a corporation, legally organized, has ceased to exist or has so acted as to incur a forfeiture of its corporate franchise, the corporation itself is the proper defendant,[99] and a like rule obtains where it is claimed that a corporation usurps powers or franchise beyond those given it by its charter.[1] In a proper case, where the issues are such as to justify the joinder, both the corporation and individuals may be joined.[2]

building and loan association.[7]

Assignor and assignee of franchise. An action to forfeit franchises which have been illegally assigned by one corporation to another must be brought against the assignee company.[8] The assignor company is a proper party to the action or proceeding,[9] and according to one,[10] although not another,[11] authority, it is a necessary party.

The receiver of a corporation, appointed by a federal court, is neither a necessary nor a proper party to quo warranto by the state to forfeit the charter.[12]

Purchaser at execution sale of a franchise of corporation need not be made a party to a proceeding to forfeit the charter of the corporation.[13]

c. Proceedings to Try Title to Office

In quo warranto proceedings to try title to office, general rules have been applied as to proper or necessary parties defendant, or the joinder thereof.

The incumbent is a necessary party to a quo warranto proceeding instituted to determine his title to an office.[14] Under some authorities, the person who claims and exercises an office is the only proper defendant in a quo warranto proceeding to test the right to such office,[15] unless it is alleged that a person, other than the incumbent, is entitled to the office, in which case, under the construction placed on some code provisions, he must be made a party defendant,[16] or unless the object of the information is not only to oust the incumbent of the office, but also to require another officer to restore the relator to the office, in which case the latter officer may be made a party.[17] However, a corporation may be held to have an interest legally sufficient to have it constituted a proper party defendant in proceedings questioning election to a number of offices therein,[18] as where ouster of the officers would cause a definite disruption in its affairs.[19]

In a case where the rights involved and the proof are not substantially similar as to all defendants, it is improper to join two or more defendants in one proceeding to try their titles to different offices;[20] but the incumbents of several offices may be named as defendants or respondents in one proceeding where the rights or titles of all depend on the same matters of law or fact,[21] such as the validity of the same election,[22] and this is especially true where all are members of one body, such as a board or council.[23]

A proceeding against one acting as mayor of a city may be against the officer, describing him as such, for usurping a franchise, or against him as an individual, charging the usurpation of the office.[24]

§ 33. Intervention and Substitution of Parties

General rules and statutes governing the intervention or substitution of parties have been applied in quo warranto proceedings.

Intervention of persons or corporations having an interest in the subject matter of the litigation is sometimes allowed in quo warranto proceedings;[25] but in jurisdictions wherein the proceeding is deemed quasi-criminal in character, as discussed supra § 3, there is no right to intervene.[26] It has been both affirmed[27] and denied[28] that there may be a right to intervene in a proceeding to forfeit or vacate the charter of a corporation. It is no objection to an intervention that the intervenor may oppose both parties.[29]

A petition to intervene has been held to call on the trial judge to exercise his discretion as to whether the issue presented by the petition is germane to the particular purpose of the proceeding[30] and would determine the several rights of diverse parties, as to the same office;[31] and a statute providing that where a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties the court may direct them to be brought in, and that where a person, not a party, has an interest or title which the judgment may affect, the court, on application, shall direct him to be made a party, applies to quo warranto proceedings.[32]

Under a statutory provision that an intervention shall be in subordination to, and in recognition of, the propriety of the main proceeding, one who is permitted to intervene as defendant in a quo warranto proceeding has not been permitted to enter a special appearance and move for dismissal of the main proceedings.[33]

Change or substitution of relator is proper in case of the death of the original relator;[34] but the court will not permit the substitution of a private person as a relator in the place of the attorney general who desires to discontinue the proceeding.[35] Where,

Inclusion of property within city limits

(1) In proceeding for exclusion from city limits of part of a tract which had been included in the municipality by statute, owners of other property in the same tract had the right to intervene and ask for exclusion of their property, although not invited to join the suit.--City of Auburndale v. State ex rel. Landis, 184 So. 787, 135 Fla. 172.

(2) In proceeding by town to challenge propriety of proceeding to include within city limits territory belonging to town, another town occupying practically same position as relator would be allowed to intervene; and taxpayers, residents, and mining companies owning property in affected area, who or which might have special rights which would be affected by final determination, would be permitted to intervene, although they might not have been permitted to come in as original and only relators.—State ex rel. (2) In so far as it conflicts with the statute governing quo warranto, the chancery rule that an intervenor must have such interest in the suit that a full and complete determination cannot be had without him and that he may neither change the issues between the parties nor raise new ones cannot apply; where the original complaint was filed by the state's attorney on the relation of persons claiming offices which they alleged defendants were usurping on a city board of fire and police commissioners, the chief of police, the acting police matron, and certain police officers and firemen had an interest which entitled them to intervene, and they were not required to allege that they did not participate in the election, since the proceeding was a public one.--People ex rel. Sandberg v. Grabs, 26 N. E.2d 494, 373 Ill. 423.

Request that attorney general file petition

Where the proceeding, already on file, is public in its nature, interveners need not allege that they had asked the attorney general and state's attorney to file their petition to intervene, the court's leave to intervene being all that need be obtained.—People ex rel. pending the determination of proceedings to test the legality of a corporate election, the terms of office of the original respondents expire, the court may order the substitution, for the original respondents, of the persons elected or appointed to fill their respective places.[36]

§ 34. Process

Except in some instances, as in the case of special statutes, general rules governing process in civil actions apply in quo warranto proceedings

In the absence of voluntary appearance, jurisdiction of defendant in a quo warranto proceeding may be acquired only by proper notice to, or service of proper process on, him;[37] and in the absence of special legislative direction, the courts may, in the interests of justice, direct that notice be served on parties who may probably or possibly be interested in the outcome of the litigation under constitutional or legislative provisions.[38] In the absence of statute, the form or manner of notifying defendant or other person to appear[39] and the length of notice[40] are within the discretion of the court. Rules and statutes relating to process in civil actions generally are sometimes held not applicable to quo warranto proceedings,[41] especially where there are other statutes making special provision for the issuance and return of process in such proceedings.[42] However, where a civil action under the code is substituted for quo warranto, as discussed supra § 1, the process is the same as in other civil actions;[43] and a statute providing that jurisdiction in actions in the nature of quo warranto be obtained by the service of notice "as in other actions" means the same process by which jurisdiction is obtained in civil actions.[44] A summons requiring defendant to answer in a shorter time than that allowed by a code or statutory provision is fatally defective.[45]

At common law the first process was a venire facias or subpœna, and, if defendant failed to appear in response thereto, a distringas or attachment was next issued.[46]

Alternative writ is sufficient where it follows the language of the prayer of the information for the issuance of process requiring and commanding defendant to show by what authority he is practicing the profession in question.[47] The issuance of an alternative writ has been held neither authorized nor required.[48]

Rule to appear and plead or to show cause Unless authorized by statute,[49] a rule on defendant to appear and plead within a time fixed is not sufficient to confer jurisdiction over him[50] A private relator applying for a writ of quo warranto has been held not entitled to the writ without a previous rule to show cause.[51]

Extraterritorial service of process is permissible under the construction placed on some statutes.[52]

Service by publication on nonresidents in a proceeding in a particular court cannot be made where the statute provides that such court has jurisdiction of quo warranto only within the county in which defendant resides[53]

Motion to quash or set aside. A motion to quash the writ may be made before pleading to the information,[54] and may be entertained and acted on by the court even after the writ is issued.[55] The writ will be quashed where it is made returnable at a time not authorized by law[56] On the other hand, the fact that the writ was not served in time, although ground for a motion to set aside the service,[57] is not ground for a motion to quash the writ.[58] A citation will not be quashed because of its failure to state the nature of the relator's demand where the nature of such demand is sufficiently stated in a certified copy of the petition accompanying the citation.[59]

Waiver of objections. Objections to the service of the writ or notice,[60] or to the lack of service,[61] are waived by pleading to the merits.

§ 35. Pleading

The defendant's appearance and pleading to the merits waive the objection that an information is demurrable and lays no foundation for bringing him into court.

Defendant's appearance and pleading to the merits waive the objection that an information is demurrable[62] and lays no foundation for bringing him into court.[63]

§ 36. —— Mode and Form in General

The pleadings in a quo warranto action or proceeding are governed by the rules applicable to pleadings in ordinary civil actions.

The pleadings in a quo warranto action or proceeding are governed in general by the rules applicable to pleadings in ordinary civil actions,[64] and, as far as possible, should conform to such rules.[65] In a code state the pleadings should conform to the general code of civil procedure;[66] and in a state where, except as changed by statute, the common law governs pleadings in civil actions, the pleadings should, in the main, be in accordance with the common law.[67] In early decisions, however, including some rendered in jurisdictions wherein the pleadings are now governed by the rules obtaining in civil actions generally, it was held that, in a proceeding by information in the nature of quo warranto, the rules of criminal pleading should be enforced as far as pertinent.[68]

(1) In General

Under some statutes a quo warranto proceeding may be instituted by complaint and summons or by making application for a writ by petition, but an information may be employed except where the codes require use of a complaint While a complaint or information is a pleading in one sense, strictly its office is not to tender an issue of fact but to call on defendant in general terms to show by what warrant he holds and exercises the privilege claimed The sufficiency of the pleading may be determinable by common-law rules, but there must be compliance with statutes relating to form and contents.

Under some statutes a quo warranto proceeding may be instituted by complaint and summons,[69] or by the ancient practice of making application for a writ by petition,[70] but an information may be employed,[71] except in jurisdictions wherein the use of a complaint is required by code provision,[72] and even in such jurisdictions the complaint may be the same in effect as the common-law information.[73]

A complaint or information in a quo warranto proceeding is, in one sense, a pleading,[74] but it is not a pleading in the strict sense;[75] its office is not to tender an issue of fact,[76] but, following the function of the ancient writ, it is the voice of sovereignty calling on defendant in general terms to show by what warrant he holds and exercises the privilege claimed,[77] and plaintiff is not required to allege any fact.[78] It is not a pleading founded on a written instrument within the meaning of a statute requiring a copy of the instrument to be filed in such cases.[79]

The sufficiency of the pleading may be determinable by common-law rules,[80] but there should be a compliance with any applicable code or statutory provisions relating to the form or contents of the pleading.[81] An information must make some charge against defendant or respondent,[82] where it is sought to invoke a statutory remedy in the nature of quo warranto, it is necessary to allege matters showing that the case is within the statute;[83] and, if the case-made is one to which another remedy would ordinarily apply, the information must be so drawn as to show that such other remedy has been exhausted or is inapplicable.[84] Where technical words are not employed, the court will use the ordinary meaning of the words in the pleading.[85]

Consent of state officer. In a case which may be presented only by a state officer, or with his consent, the information should be exhibited by him,[86] and show on its face that it is presented on his authority.[87]

Interest of private relator. Where there is a private relator or plaintiff, the petition or information must set forth such an interest on his part in the subject matter of the inquiry as will be sufficient, in the particular jurisdiction, to give him a standing to institute and maintain the proceeding.[88]

Writ treated as pleading
(1) Under the statute permitting demurrer to a writ of quo warranto, the writ must be treated as a pleading as well as a process, and, since it is the only pleading at that stage of the proceeding, must contain factual averments which, if true, will justify the relief sought.—State ex rel. George v. Lutz, 46 S.E.2d 245, 131 W.Va 126
(2) Under the statute, restricting a defendant to a plea of not guilty or to a demurrer or both to a writ of quo warranto, a plea of not guilty goes only to the writ which must contain sufficient factual averments so that defendant may join issue by a plea of not guilty.—State ex rel. Departure from, or conformity with, petition for leave. An information in the nature of a quo warranto is not necessarily bad because it does not follow the petition for leave of court to file the information,[89] provided it does not go outside of the substantial subject matter of the petition[90] or of the order allowing the information to be filed.[91] The filing of an information without leave of court, when leave is required, is not the commencement of the suit; until the petition for leave is granted, the information on file is a mere nullity.[92] On order of court authorizing the proceeding, however, the original petition becomes effective without the filing of a new pleading.[93]

Recital of giving bond by the relator can have no proper place in the information where the statute requires the bond to be given on the filing of the information.[94]

Surplusage. An unnecessary allegation in an information may be disregarded as surplusage.[95]

Conclusion. In some,[96] but not in other,[97] jurisdictions, a complaint or information in quo warranto proceedings should conclude against the peace and dignity of the state or the people thereof.

Prayer. In determining whether a complaint or information states a cause of action, the prayer thereof may be disregarded[98] and the complaint or information may be held sufficient if it states a cause of action for some relief,[99] either under a statute[1] or at common law.[2] Where several matters are included in the information, a prayer for relief need not be added to each paragraph,[3] since a prayer at the end of the information will be taken distributively.[4]

Term for filing In some jurisdictions an information in the nature of a quo warranto should be filed at the law term,[5] rather than at the trial term;[6] and, if wrongly filed, may be transferred.[7]

(2) General or Definite Allegations

In some jurisdictions the complaint or information may be in general terms, but in other jurisdictions the facts on which the complainant relies must be alleged in the complaint or information positively and certainly, and in a traversable form.

In some jurisdictions the complaint or information may be in general terms,[8] at least where usurpation is claimed,[9] and it is sufficient to set forth the rights and privileges usurped,[10] and the wrongful act or omission complained of,[11] as by alleging that defendant or respondent holds and exercises or enjoys the right, license, privilege, or franchise in question without lawful authority.[12] These rules obtained at common law,[13] and in some code states the allegations need not be more specific and detailed than was required at common law.[14] In jurisdictions where such rules obtain, however, specific matters which might be set up in the replication may, at the pleader's option, be alleged in the information,[15] and, if the complaint, besides making general allegations which, standing alone, would be sufficient, specifies the particular facts claimed to show usurpation or other illegality, and these do not amount to a cause of action, the entire pleading is bad.[16]

In other jurisdictions the facts known to complainant, and on which he relies, must be alleged in the complaint or information[17] positively,[18] with certainty,[19] and in a traversable form;[20] and statements which are mere conclusions of law are insufficient;[21] and in jurisdictions where such provisions exist, effect will be accorded code or statutory provisions that the complaint shall set forth facts warranting the issue of the writ and the judgment sought thereon,[22] that the information shall consist of a plain statement of the facts which constitute the grounds of the proceeding,[23] or that the complaint must concisely and clearly set forth the act or omission complained of.[24]

b. In Proceeding Relating to Corporation

(1) Public corporations
(2) Private corporations

(1) Public Corporations

A petition, complaint, or information attacking the formation of a public corporation, or seeking to restrain the unlawful exercise of powers by such a corporation, must state a cause of action.

A petition, complaint, or information attacking the formation or incorporation of a municipal or other public corporation must state a cause of action,[25] and it is insufficient to do so where it shows that the incorporation is valid;[26] but, if the object of the proceeding is to restrain the unlawful exercise of powers by a municipality whose existence is admitted, the fact of the incorporation of defendant should be stated so as to show its legality and powers,[27] and the information or petition should show an unlawful usurpation of authority by the municipality that is remedial in the quo warranto proceeding.[28] Facts, and not conclusions, must be

Information or petition held insufficient

(1) To test, in quo warranto, city's right to lease improved public levee, where petition disclosed that lease was valid.—State v. McCombs, 133 P.2d 134, 156 Kan. 391.

(2) To state cause of action in quo warranto on ground that respondent was prohibited by constitution from purchasing stock of private corporation.—State ex rel. Johnson v. Consumers Public Power Dist., 10 N.W.2d 784, 143 Neb. 753, 152 A.L.R. 480.

(3) To state cause of action on ground that ice plants and steam-heating systems of public service company were not properties which respondent public power district had authority to purchase when it acquired all of common stock of such company.—State ex rel. Johnson v. Consumers Public Power Dist., supra.

alleged to show that the results would have been different if the matters complained of had not occurred.[29]

Annexation. A petition attacking the validity of annexation of territory to a city is sufficient where it clearly shows that the action of the city in the annexation was not a compliance with an applicable statute.[30] An information questioning the annexation of lands to a drainage district need not allege fraud.[31]

(2) Private Corporations

An information charging an association or a number of individuals with acting or assuming to act as a corporation without right, or to determine the right of a corporation to a franchise claimed to be usurped or exercised without lawful authority, may be in general terms; but in order to forfeit a corporate charter because of misuser or nonuser of the corporate franchise or powers, the complaint or information should clearly state specific facts.

An information charging an association or number of individuals with acting or assuming to act, as a corporation without right to do so or without being incorporated may be in general terms;[32] and an information to determine the right of a corporation to a franchise claimed to be usurped or exercised without lawful authority is sufficient if it sets forth the franchise, alleges its usurpation or unauthorized exercise in general terms, and calls on defendant to show by what authority the franchise is exercised.[33] An information stating generally that respondent was doing business in the state unlawfully is not insufficient,[34] but, when the information attempts by specific allegations to charge usurpation or illegal conduct on the part of respondent, it may be attacked for insufficiency.[35] A petition which attempts to specify the ground on which it is based should not be equivocal, but should show whether a usurpation or a forfeiture is claimed.[36]

In a proceeding to oust a corporation de facto, where its existence as such is admitted or charged, the defects in the proceedings for its organization must be set out distinctly;[37] in order to forfeit a charter because of misuser of the corporate franchise or powers, the complaint or information should allege clearly and distinctly the illegal acts constituting such misuser;[38] and similarly, specific facts vate corporation terminated such corporation's contractual guaranties of payment of certain municipal bonds without notice to, or consent of, municipalities, and made no provision to fulfill obligations of franchises or contracts assigned to district.—State ex rel. Johnson v. Consumers Public Power Dist., supra.

Nev.—State ex rel. Bibb v. City of Reno, 178 P.2d 366, 64 Nev. 127.

Existence of jurisdictional facts

Complaint in quo warranto to annul annexation of territory to city should allege that jurisdictional facts, alleged to have been determined by city council without taking evidence, did not exist to present issue as to council's fact findings.—People ex rel. Strong v. City of Whittier, 24 P.2d 219, 133 Cal.App. 316.

Specification of statutory justification for proceeding

Where state's complaint in quo warranto proceeding did not charge defendant corporation in so many words with exercising powers not conferred by law, but did allege that by publication of certain specified scandalous matters defendant corporation had exceeded its corporate authority, and violated constitutional and statutory provisions and defendant made no specific objections, court had right to infer that state was relying on part of quo warranto statute authorizing a quo warranto proceeding to be brought when any corporation exercises powers not conferred by law, as justification for the proceeding.—People v. White Circle League of America, 37 N.E.2d 811, 408 Ill. 564.

In Missouri

(1) In a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto asking for a judgment of ouster, when the proceeding was ex officio by the attorney general, it is unnecessary that the pleading on its face show anything more than that the corporation assumed, usurped, and unlawfully exercised corporate privileges. This is sufficient to put it on its defense. If a corporate franchise is claimed by the state to have been usurped, it need only be alleged generally that the franchise is being exercised without lawful authority.—State v. Monarch Transfer, etc., Co., 20 S.W.2d 60, 323 Mo. 562.
51 C.J. p 345 note 24.

(2) If evident purpose of proceeding is to forfeit charter of corporation for usurpation of powers, relator must plead acts specifically.—State ex inf. Miller v. St. Louis Union Trust Co., 74 S.W.2d 318, 335 Mo. 845; State v. Grimm, 119 S.W. 626, 220 Mo. 483.

hould be clearly stated if a forfeiture is asked ecause of nonuser of franchises[39] or omission of statutory duty to make reports.[40] The misfeasance or nonfeasance charged as a ground of forfeiture must be alleged to be willful,[41] or at least o be either willful or due to lack of means,[42] but t need not be alleged to be in contravention of the xpress terms of a prohibitory statute or statute mposing a definite penalty.[43] In a proceeding to ust a foreign corporation from its permit to do usiness in the state, it is not necessary for the ttorney general to set out in his information with hat degree of certainty required in an indictment r declaration the ultimate facts on which he reies,[44] and allegations of so-called corelators must, or purposes of issuance of the writ, be accepted as rue and treated as if made on the authority of the ttorney general and in his name.[45]

Jurisdiction. An information against persons acting as a corporation must allege that they have o acted within the state,[46] and in a proceeding to issolve a corporation or forfeit its charter, there hould be allegations as to the time and place of incorporation[47]

Interest of relator. Where a private person claiming to have an interest is the relator, his interest must be shown by allegations of fact,[48] and not merely stated as a conclusion[49]

c. In Proceeding Relating to Office

(1) Public office
(2) Office in private corporation

(1) Public Office

In a proceeding against an incumbent of a public office, the pleading must show that the case is within the controlling statutory provisions, and, according to some authorities and under some circumstances, should sufficiently allege the legal existence of the office, the title or interest of the claimant or relator, and that the defendant usurps or intrudes into the office or holds, possesses, or exercises it unlawfully or without lawful authority.

In a jurisdiction wherein an information in the nature of quo warranto is governed by statute, an information, in order to state a cause of action against an incumbent of a public office, must make allegations showing that the case is within the statute,[50] but it has been held that a petition which follows the language of the statute is sufficient.[51]

Existence of office. The petition or information must allege the legal existence of the office in question,[52] at least where the office, if it exists, was created by a local[53] or private[54] law, and the information questions the legality of the appointment or election of an individual to the office or his qualification to fill it;[55] but, where the information challenges the legal existence of a court, to which the office of judge appertains, and characterizes the court as a pretended one, it is not necessary to make the inconsistent allegation that the office exists.[56] An information has been held not demurrable, however, because the same count or paragraph thereof attacked respondent's right to office and also the validity of the statute creating the office.[57]

Value of office. The only purpose of an allegation of the value of the office in question is to show that the court in which the suit is brought has jurisdiction thereof by reason of the amount in controversy.[58] The value may be alleged in the same manner as the value of any tangible thing.[59]

Title or interest of claimant or relator. A complaint or information filed by, or at the instance of, a private person to oust the incumbent, and obtain possession of an office, must contain allegations showing that plaintiff or claimant is entitled to the office,[60] and this requires the statement of facts, not mere legal conclusions.[61] On the other hand, a complaint or petition to oust the incumbent of an office, when presented on behalf of the state by the attorney general or prosecuting attorney, need not set forth the name of a claimant to the office;[62] nor need it show that the relator is entitled to the office,[63] or that he has a special or peculiar interest,[64] unless respondent's alleged usurpation depends on the validity of relator's election;[65] but the interest of the relator in the suit should appear.[66] If the information is filed by the attorney general, the court will inquire whether or not the incumbent is a de jure officer.[67] Words in the information indicating that the proceeding was on relation of designated persons may be treated as surplusage, and demurrer thereto for failure to state facts showing their special interest in the case overruled if enough remains to state a cause of action,[68] as where, after elision of the matter in question, the information contains sufficient allegations to state a cause of action in the nature of quo warranto and to show that it was brought by the prosecuting attorney in his official capacity as the representative of the state and for the protection of the public interest[69]

Defendant's wrong. Except in a few jurisdictions,[70] it is sufficient to allege in general terms that defendant usurps or intrudes into a designated public office or holds, possesses, or exercises it unlawfully or without lawful authority,[71] but, when the pleading goes further and by its averments discloses a state of facts which prima facie entitle respondent to the office, and does not specify the objections intended to be made to his title, it is subject to attack.[72] Ordinarily some allegation of usurpation, intrusion, or unlawful possession or exercise of the office is necessary;[73] and, where specific allegations are made, they must be sufficient to state a cause of action.[74] Various independent acts or omissions may be alleged, and they may be entirely unrelated to other allegations, provided each independent act or omission alleged, if proved, must be such as would work a forfeiture of the office.[75]

Where the information is filed by, or at the instance of, a private person to obtain possession of the office, it is necessary in some jurisdictions that the information, in addition to setting out the relator's title, should specify the objections to defendant's title;[76] but in other jurisdictions it is not necessary to allege anything regarding defendant's title[77]

Facts affecting validity of statute. Where it is asserted that the legislative act under which defendant claims to hold office is unconstitutional as special legislation, it is not necessary to plead the facts

Suit based on unlawful holding

Under statute giving right of action by state to effect ouster of one usurping, intruding into, or unlawfully holding or exercising public office, complaint in quo warranto seeking to oust tax commissioners was held not demurrable on ground that facts pleaded did not show usurpation, intrusion, illegal or invalid entry into office, since right of action for unlawful holding and exercising of office was basis for right of action, which is different from usurpation or intrusion into office.—State ex rel Sullivan v. which render the statute objectionable,[78] at least where they appear on the face of the act.[79]

Prayer for unauthorized relief. A petition in a proceeding which is ostensibly one in quo warranto does not state a cause of action where it asks the court to order election officials, not made parties, to count certain undisputed ballots, averred not to have been counted, and there is no statutory authority for such an order.[80]

(2) Office in Private Corporation

A petition or information in a quo warranto proceeding based on the usurpation of an office in a private corporation should allege the interest or title of the relator or claimant, usurpation of a corporate office by defendant, and that the offense is of a nature which concerns the public.

A petition or information in a quo warranto proceeding based on the usurpation of an office in a private corporation should show the interest or title of the relator or claimant[81] and usurpation by defendant,[82] that the usurpation is of a corporate office,[83] and that the offense is of a nature which concerns the public.[84] Unless the corporation is one whereof the court will take judicial notice, its organization must be shown by alleging compliance with all the requisite forms of law.[85] An allegation that another person was elected to the office in question is not irrelevant or immaterial.[86] An information alleging that defendant was elected at an illegal meeting, and that he deceived the relators as to the time of such meeting, need not allege that the relators would, if present, have voted against defendant.[87]

Office in political party. A petition challenging respondent's rights to hold an office in a political party, which is not a state public office, but which has a status in law at least equivalent to that of an office in a corporation, has been held sufficient as against an objection that it showed on its face that the relator had made no attempt to pursue remedies available to him in the forums of the party,[88] and that he was himself the holder of the office.[89]

d. In Proceeding Relating to Profession

A complaint, petition, or information which follows the language of the statute in charging defendant with intruding into a profession without having obtained a license therefor, as required by statute, is sufficient.

A complaint, petition, or information which follows the language of the statute in charging defendant with intruding into the profession of treating, or offering to treat, diseases of human beings without having obtained a license or certificate of qualification therefor, as required by statute, is sufficient.[90]

In proceedings in the nature of quo warranto the merits are presented by pleas or answers, but ordinarily a simple traverse by a general denial or a plea of the general issue is insufficient, and it is necessary that respondent either disclaim or justify, and, if he justifies, that he plead fully and completely the facts necessary to establish his lawful right or authority.

In proceedings in the nature of quo warranto the merits are presented by pleas or answers.[91] Under the common law practice the defense to a quo warranto information is by plea,[92] and not in the form of an answer;[93] but under code provisions defendant may file an answer.[94] One good plea is sufficient,[95] and according to early authorities only one plea may be filed as of right,[96] but according to later authorities numerous defenses may be set up in the answer[97] or by separate pleas,[98] provided they are not inconsistent[99] and are not beyond the scope of the remedy[1] and the jurisdiction of the court,[2] as defined and limited by statute. The question as to the jurisdiction of the court is properly raised by answer if the lack of jurisdiction appears dehors the information.[3]

Proceeding by information in nature of writ of quo warranto distinguished
(1) Under some statutes, defendant in a quo warranto proceeding under the code as distinguished from

Ordinarily, a simple traverse by a general denial or a plea of the general issue is insufficient in a quo warranto proceeding,[4] at least where defendant is charged generally with exercising a privilege, power, or franchise without authority of law and is called on to show his warrant or authority,[5] and it is necessary in such case that he either disclaim or justify,[6] and, if he justifies, that he plead fully and completely the facts necessary to establish his lawful right or authority,[7] but he need not anticipate a matter which may properly be pleaded in the replication;[8] and in a code state wherein an ordinary civil action has been substituted for the common-law remedies, defendant's pleading will be liberally construed[9] and held not to be vitiated by a mere excessive claim.[10] A high degree of certainty is required.[11] An information in quo warranto is sufficiently answered by a plea which sets out all material facts relative to the questions properly raised by the information;[12] but a plea is insufficient if it contains nothing on which a material issue can be formed,[13] and in such case judgment may be rendered on the record, without any evidence being introduced.[14]

Matter of inducement is not traversable,[15] and as to it the plea should be silent.[16]

Plea of estoppel as to only some of the relators is faulty.[17] In order to be sufficient, the plea must show that the events alleged to constitute the estoppel occurred before the filing of the information.[18]

Plea of non usurpavit is a form of traverse, in an action or proceeding against one alleged to have usurped an office or franchise, denying the usurpation charged.[19]

Failure of relator to pay taxes. Where the relator has alleged that he is a citizen and taxpayer, a plea charging that the relator, although having returned property for taxation, has failed to pay taxes is insufficient.[20]

a code proceeding by information in the nature of writ of quo warranto is limited to a plea of not guilty, demurrer to the writ, or both, but may not answer, but, if the proceeding is by information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, he may answer the information, demur, or both —State ex rel George v Lutz, 46 S.E.2d 245, 131 W.Va 126.

Pendency of another action having the same object in view is not sufficiently pleaded to bring the matter before the court for consideration where the allegations made for this purpose are mere conclusions of the pleader that the allegations and issues in the two suits are the same and do not set forth any substantive facts from which the court may ascertain for itself what the allegations and issues in the other suit are.[21]

b. In Proceeding Relating to Corporation

In a proceeding attacking the organization of a public corporation or the annexation of land thereto, or to oust certain lands from the jurisdiction thereof, the plea or answer must set out all facts necessary to show the legality of the challenged action; and similar rules apply where an illegal exercise of the franchise of a private corporation is charged.

On an information attacking the organization of an alleged municipal or other public corporation, the plea or answer must set out all facts necessary to show a legal incorporation.[22] Likewise, where the annexation of lands or territory to a district or municipality is challenged, defendants must allege all the facts necessary to show the legality of the annexation.[23] In proceedings to oust certain lands from the jurisdiction of a municipality, it is the duty of the respondent to answer the allegations of the information fully and specifically, showing what it has done or failed to do or planned to do with respect to furnishing municipal benefits to the described territory,[24] and, where the information alleges a total absence of municipal benefits, a return alleging speculative future benefits is an insufficient answer,[25] but allegations showing that the property in question has received some benefit, that obligations have been undertaken by the municipality on the strength of the territory, and that the incorporation was encouraged and acquiesced in for a number of years are sufficient to raise a defense of laches.[26]

Private corporation. Where an illegal exercise of corporate franchises is charged, the plea should, as a general rule, be either of justification or a disclaimer,[27] and a plea of justification must contain allegations of all such facts as are necessary to show authority for the use of the franchises.[28] A denial of legal conclusions is insufficient;[29] but, where the complaint sets out facts establishing the illegality of the alleged corporation, a denial of the allegations of fact is proper;[30] and such an answer by the individuals composing the corporation is good without any disclaimer or justification by the corporation itself.[31] In a proceeding to oust a foreign corporation from its permit to do business in the state, a high degree of certainty is required in the plea or answer.[32] In proceedings to forfeit defendant's charter for violation of a law against combinations, it may be pleaded that such law is unconstitutional.[33]

public office, defendant may disclaim holding the office,[34] but, if he does not, he may and must justify by setting out in his plea or answer all the facts necessary to establish a lawful right or valid title to the office,[35] and the plea is sufficient if it sets up facts showing a right on the part of respondent to exercise the powers and duties of the office alleged to have been usurped.[36] A plea of non usurpavit is not permissible,[37] except in some jurisdictions wherein the statutes require the complaint to set forth the facts warranting the issuance of the writ.[38]

The plea or answer must allege the existence or performance of all conditions precedent to defendant's right to exercise the privilege of office,[39] and it must also show that his right to hold the office continued to the time of filing the information.[40] It may and must show that defendant was properly appointed or elected,[41] and also that he is eligible to hold the office[42] and that he qualified by taking the proper oath and filing a bond or otherwise complying with the legal requirements.[43] A plea may be bad for duplicity,[44] because it contains a negative pregnant,[45] or because of any other of the grounds on which pleas at common law may be attacked.[46] Defendant may set up several titles to the office.[47]

Matter affecting claimant or relator. While it is no answer to an information by the state to allege that the relator is not entitled to the office,[48] or that claimant is estopped to question defendant's title, by reason of an agreement between them to abide by the result of another suit involving their respective claims,[49] in proceedings begun by a claimant of the office, to enforce his private right, a plea is good which shows that claimant's title is invalid.[50] On the other hand, in a proceeding brought on behalf of the state by the attorney general to determine which of two respondents is entitled to an office, one respondent is not called on to show that the other is disqualified therefor,[51] particularly if such facts are not necessarily involved in the determination of the issue with respect to his own right to hold the office as between himself and the relator.[52]

(2) Office in Private Corporation

A plea which attempts to justify the respondent's right to hold an office in a private corporation or in a political party must set out specifically all the facts necessary to show a good right or title on his part.

Allegations that relator was not resident citizen

Allegations in plea of respondent holding over after expiration of his term that relator elected as county superintendent of education was not resident citizen of state and county for required time were allegations of facts.—Wilkins v. Large, 141 So. 585, 163 Miss. 279.

Reason for rule

Absence of right in another claiming office is immaterial unless such fact serves to qualify, explain, or justify respondent's right.—State on Inf. of McKittrick v. Wiley, supra.

The proper mode of attacking indefiniteness is, in some jurisdictions, by a motion to make more definite and certain.[91]

The facts alleged in a plea, answer, or return must be assumed and taken to be true on a motion to strike[92] or for judgment on the pleadings.[93] A motion by the relator for judgment on the pleadings waives everything not appearing on the face of the pleadings.[94] On defendant's motion for determination of proposed questions of law in advance of trial, allegations of fact in the petition are conclusive.[95]

(2) Demurrer

The legal sufficiency of a pleading in quo warranto proceedings may be tested by demurrer, but even an indefinite pleading may be sufficient to withstand a demurrer.

In a quo warranto proceeding or action, a demurrer will lie to test the legal sufficiency of a pleading,[96] such as a petition, complaint, or information,[97] plea or answer,[98] or replication;[99] but, even though indefinite, a pleading may be sufficient to withstand a demurrer,[1] or at least a general demurrer.[2] An information is not subject to demurrer on the grounds that it was improvidently ordered filed,[3] that the petition on which leave to file was granted was not filed in the clerk's office before the information was filed,[4] or that a defective copy of the information was served on defendant, where he was not misled thereby, and when, being in court otherwise, the service of the copy was not essential.[5] A complaint is not demurrable on the ground that it fails to state a cause of action in favor of a private person, named as the relator with the state's attorney, where the state is the real party plaintiff and the particular interest which the relator may have is immaterial;[6] and a demurrer is not a proper mode of presenting possession of a license as a defense.[7] The question as to the jurisdiction of the court is properly raised by demurrer if lack of jurisdiction appears on the face of the information,[8] but the question of authority to institute the proceeding cannot be raised by demurrer where lack of authority does not appear on the face of the information.[9] If an information or plea is insufficient in any respect which might be cured by amendment, but the objection is not made by demurrer or otherwise, the defect will be deemed waived,[10] and may not be urged after trial and verdict.[11]

Speaking demurrer is of no avail to raise any question as to the sufficiency of a petition or information.[12]

Abandonment or withdrawal A demurrer filed may not be withdrawn and a plea presented as matter of right,[13] but it may be deemed abandoned when it is incorporated in, and made a part of, the return or answer and no ruling is demanded or made thereon.[14]

Argument and issues The argument of a demurrer will not be given a preference on the calendar,[15] although the office in question is an annual one.[16] Where, in the information, the relator claims the office, respondent, by demurring to the information, puts in issue the relator's title to the office.[17] On a joinder in demurrer to a plea of due incorporation, the only question in issue is the legal incorporation of defendant[18] A question of fact cannot be determined on demurrer in quo warranto proceedings.[19]

Construction of pleading on demurrer. A complaint seeking quo warranto is construed against the pleader on demurrer.[20] Separate counts in an information must be considered independently of each other when a demurrer is interposed;[21] but, where an information seeking to oust respondent from office and induct the relator into office is but a single pleading, all facts averred must be read and treated as the statement of the relator's cause of action[22] All allegations inconsistent with constitutional, statutory, or charter provisions relating to the subject matter of the proceeding should be disregarded.[23]

Effect as admission. A demurrer is an admission of all facts well pleaded;[24] but it does not admit conclusions of law stated in the pleading[25] or the construction given by the pleader to a complaint and order of court in other proceedings[26] Where the complaint does not allege that defendant did not qualify, as provided by law, before entering on the duties of his office, the presumption, on demurrer to the complaint, is that he did[27]

b. Disposition and Subsequent Proceedings

On demurrer to a pleading in quo warranto, it is to be tested by the rules applicable to ordinary civil actions; and the demurrer should be sustained if the pleading is insufficient, and not sustained if the pleading is sufficient. In a proper case, authority may be given to file new or amended pleadings, or final judgment may be rendered.

On demurrer to a pleading in quo warranto, it is to be tested by the rules applicable to ordinary civil actions;[28] and on demurrer to the information or a motion to quash it, the court may proceed to determine the law as affecting the rights and powers of the persons proceeded against.[29] A demurrer should be sustained if the pleading demurred to is insufficient when tested by the demurrer,[30] and should not be sustained if the pleading is sufficient;[31] but it has been held that a demurrer to an information should not be sustained where the information presents many interesting questions of novelty and importance which may be more satisfactorily dealt with when proof is adduced.[32]

Where, in an original proceeding in the highest court of the state, the judges are equally divided in opinion, demurrers and motions will be overruled or denied.[33] Where a demurrer to the information was filed after answer without leave of court, consideration of the demurrer is discretionary with the court.[34] In a proceeding to test the legality of defendant's organization, a court order declaring defendant a public corporation, as shown by a certified copy thereof filed by defendant, should not be considered in ruling on the sufficiency of the petition as against a demurrer.[35] The absence of the attorney general from the particular hearing on which the merits of a demurrer to the bill were discussed does not require a dismissal of the bill.[36] In a proper case judgment may be granted on the pleadings.[37]

Voluntary discontinuance or withdrawal of relator. After judgment for respondent on a demurrer, plaintiff cannot discontinue the suit without the consent of respondent;[38] nor can private persons who have appeared as relators withdraw from the proceeding as a matter of right.[39]

Filing of new or amended pleading. On the sustaining of a demurrer to a petition or complaint, plaintiff should be allowed to amend where the demurrer relates to amendable defects,[40] but leave to amend may be refused where plaintiff's case cannot be effectually aided by amendment.[41] On the overruling of a demurrer, demurrant may, and should, in a proper case, be allowed time and opportunity to plead.[42] While the relator, by filing a replication to a plea of justification after a demurrer thereto has been overruled, admits the sufficiency of the plea in law to bar a recovery,[43] such admission does not prevent him from making an issue of fact on allegations of the plea.[44]

Rendition of final judgment Judgment may be entered against defendant, on overruling a demurrer to the information, where the information is sufficient, if uncontroverted, to entitle plaintiff to the relief sought[45] and respondent elects to abide by the demurrer and refuses to plead further.[46] Where, in such case, the information is a new one filed after the voluntary dismissal of a prior one, judgment may be rendered without passing on pleas in abatement to the prior information,[47] since the dismissal of that information disposed of all pending motions and pleas concerning it.[48] Also, judgment of ouster should be given, if a demurrer to a plea is sustained,[49] any count of the information is good, and no plea legally states a sufficient answer,[50] and defendant declines to plead further;[51] and judgment may be rendered for plaintiff where defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings is denied and he rests on the motion.[52] The fact that the court, after overruling respondent's demurrer to the complaint, permitted him to cross-examine some of the relator's witnesses gave to respondent no right to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment, where respondent by his demurrer, on which he elected to stand, had admitted the truth of the well pleaded portions of the complaint.[53]

A complaint or petition may be dismissed, on sustaining a demurrer thereto, where certain phases of the case are clearly beyond the reach of amendment and it would serve no good purpose to delay the final determination of the case,[54] but it should not be dismissed where the grounds of the demurrer relate to amendable defects,[55] and the sustaining of a demurrer to averments of the relator's right does not affect the judgment which ought to be rendered if the information sufficiently shows a usurpation by defendant.[56] Where a demurrer to the replication by which the relator sought to show some disqualification or forfeiture of office was sustained, the relator has no burden to carry by the status of the pleadings, and may suffer dismissal without offering proof, and secure a review of the ruling on the demurrer.[57] Final judgment is properly rendered for defendant, on the overruling of a demurrer to a plea, where plaintiff elects to stand by the demurrer[58] or does not ask leave to traverse the plea or amend the information;[59] and the petition may be dismissed on the overruling of a demurrer to the answer, where the petition affirmatively shows that the relator refused to appear at a hearing on charges on which he was removed from the office in question.[60]

Construction of order An order overruling a demurrer to the petition and finding for plaintiff, in a case involving an office and in which plaintiff has moved for judgment on the pleadings, is an adjudication that all matters well pleaded in defendant's response, if true, do not show title to the office.[61] Where the case has been heard not only on motions to quash, dismiss, and abate, but also on a stipulation showing that the organization proceedings in question are within the terms of a curative statute, an order that the information be quashed is a disposition of the cause on the merits,[62] rather than an abatement of the suit.[63] A ruling on a motion attacking the petition, not excepted to, becomes the law of the case as respects allegations in the answer which were repetitious of the allegations in the motion.[64]

§ 41. —— Amended and Supplemental Pleadings

As in ordinary civil actions generally, pleadings in a quo warranto proceeding are subject to amendment, both as to form and substance.

Pleadings in a quo warranto action or proceeding are subject to amendment, as in ordinary civil actions,[65] and are within the application of statutes relating to amendments in civil suits generally.[66] It is largely within the discretion of the trial court as to whether a particular amendment will be permitted.[67] Amendments may be as to form,[68] or as to substance;[69] but it is not permissible to set up, in an amendment, grounds essentially different from those alleged in the original information;[70] and leave to amend plaintiff's pleading will not be granted where justice does not require it,[71] where the time limited by statute for the institution of the proceeding has expired,[72] where the original controversy has become moot,[73] or where, at the time of the application for leave to amend, there exist reasons which would induce the court to refuse leave to file an information.[74] An amended answer is properly rejected where some of the allegations are in direct conflict with the allegations of the original plea or answer and other allegations were simply a repetition and enlargement of the former allegations set forth in the original answer;[75] and an amended information amounting to an effort to obtain a further rehearing on a question already adjudicated will not be permitted to be filed.[76] Where the information challenges the legal organization of a district, a question as to the power of commissioners of the district to make a particular agreement cannot be raised by a supplemental information.[77] An original information is not abandoned by filing an amended or supplemental information;[78] nor are the allegations of fact in an original petition superseded by an amendment consisting simply of conclusions based on the original petition.[79]

Matters of defense arising after defendant has answered may be set up in a supplemental answer,[80] or by plea puis darrein continuance.[81]

§ 42. —— Issues, Proof, and Variance

The issues in a quo warranto proceeding are confined to such as are properly made by the pleadings; and, when properly traversed or put in issue, allegations of fact in a pleading must be sustained by proof, although a variance between the pleadings and proof as to an immaterial matter is not fatal.

The issues in a quo warranto action or proceeding are simple,[82] they are confined to such as are properly made by the pleadings,[83] and, where the remedy is statutory, they must of necessity be so limited as to come within the authority granted by the legislature,[84] and also so as to come within the authority of the court, where recourse is had to the original jurisdiction of an appellate court.[85] In a quo warranto action or proceeding to test the title to an office, the only issue is title to the office,[86] and, at common law, the only issue is respondent's title to the office.[87]

Matters to be proved; admissions. When properly traversed or put in issue, allegations of fact in a plea or other pleading must be sustained by proof.[88] In both the common law writ of quo war-

American Ins. Co., 200 S.W.2d 1, 355 Mo. 1053.

Disqualification of office holder
One apparently elected to county office has prima facie right thereto, ranto and information in the nature of quo warranto the ordinary rules of pleading are reversed, and the state is bound to show nothing.[89] Thus, plaintiff is not required to allege or prove any fact,[90] and no issues of fact are tendered by the complaint,[91] but the burden is on defendant,[92] defendant, not plaintiff, must tender the issues on which the rights claimed by him are to be litigated,[93] and such facts as he alleges may be rebutted.[94] It has been held, however, that in proceedings to forfeit a corporate charter, the burden rests on the state to plead and prove that the corporation has forfeited its charter by violating its terms,[95] and that, when the state institutes proceedings to oust respondent from a profession, the state must, in the first instance, offer evidence to sustain the material averments of the complaint, and, failing to meet this burden, respondent is entitled to be discharged;[96] and it has also been held that in a proceeding by a private individual to oust respondent from a public office, the burden rests on the relator to allege and prove that he is entitled to the office under the law,[97] and that respondent unlawfully holds and exercises it,[98] although, when the sovereign, the state, or its proper officer, brings an action alleging that one is wrongfully usurping an office which belongs to another, the common-law rule places the burden on respondent to show his title to the office.[99] The fact that a single information was filed against two claimants to an office does not change the rule that the issues are still between the relator and the respective respondents,[1] and each is called on to show his own title to the office.[2] In proceedings to have it adjudged that proceedings to incorporate a city were illegal and void, and to oust the city from the exercise of the municipal franchise, the question whether the territory was incorporated or unincorporated is not within the issues, and the only issue is whether the city was usurping the municipal franchise at the time of the action.[3]

While effect will be given admissions in a pleading,[4] including admissions arising from the failure of one party to deny or traverse material and relevant facts alleged by the opposite party,[5] and matters admitted or agreed on need not be proved,[6] nevertheless an admission in the answer that the relator accepted the office in question and entered on a discharge of the duties thereof is not an admission that he took an oath of office,[7] and a matter alleged in the information cannot be taken as admitted where it is substantially traversed by plea.[8]

Admissibility of evidence under pleadings. Evidence which is not objectionable on general grounds is admissible where it bears on the issues made by the pleadings.[9] Conversely, the evidence admitted must ordinarily be confined to that which bears on the issues made by the pleadings,[10] as properly construed.[11] Each count of the complaint must stand alone, and the determination of the admissibility of evidence under any count depends on the issues raised between the parties as to that count.[12] If leave of court to institute the proceeding is essential, it may be sufficiently shown by proceedings of record without an allegation thereof in the information;[13] and the unconstitutionality of the statute creating the office in question may be shown under a complaint which merely alleges that defendant unlawfully intrudes into and usurps the office.[14]

Variance between the pleadings and proof as to an immaterial matter is not fatal.[15]

§ 43. Evidence

a In general
b Presumptions and burden of proof

a. In General

The general rules of evidence governing civil actions have been applied in quo warranto proceedings with respect to the admissibility and the weight and sufficiency of evidence.

In some jurisdictions, wherein the writ of quo warranto has been abolished by code provision and a civil action has been substituted therefor, as discussed supra § 1, the action is to be tried by applying the same rules of evidence that apply in other civil actions.[16] In a majority of jurisdictions, however, while the general rules of evidence obtaining in civil actions are applied in determining the admissibility, and the weight and sufficiency of evidence, a different rule prevails in determining the burden of proof, as considered infra subdivision b of this section.

Admissibility. The rules governing the admissibility of evidence in civil actions generally are applicable in quo warranto proceedings[17] to test right or title to office,[18] to determine corporate existfession without a license or certificate.[25] However, in a few jurisdictions it is held that, in a quo warranto proceeding to remove a person from office on the ground of his commission of an unlawful act working a forfeiture of office, the strong evidence which is necessary to convict in a criminal case, discussed in Criminal Law §§ 910–913, is required.[26]

b. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

Subject to some exceptions, it is generally held that the burden of proof in quo warranto proceedings, such as a proceeding to test the right or title of a person to office, is on respondent; but a private relator seeking to recover possession of an office has the burden of showing good title to the office in himself.

In a majority of jurisdictions, the burden of proof rests on respondent in a quo warranto action or proceeding[27] to make disclosure concerning the facts averred by the relator;[28] and it is not incumbent on the state or people to prove anything in the first instance.[29] However, in some states this rule does not obtain;[30] and in such states presumptions may be invoked against the state as readily as against an individual in ordinary civil actions.[31] It has been held that in quo warranto proceedings where respondent interposes a general denial the burden is on the relator to prove the things charged as a usurpation;[32] but if respondent admits the acts so charged or relator proves them, the burden of justification by license, title, or authority is on the respondent.[33]

Various presumptions obtaining in civil actions generally have been held to obtain in proceedings in the nature of quo warranto.[34] Thus, it is not to be presumed that the attorney general applied for the writ for personal or private ends.[35]

To establish eligibility
Ky—Commonwealth by Funk v. Clark, 225 S W.2d 118, 311 Ky 710—Chadwell v. Commonwealth, by Meredith, 157 S W 2d 280, 288 Ky. 644—Commonwealth v. Mullins, 150 S.W 2d 668, 286 Ky. 242.

this has been held to be true even where the action is brought in the names of the state or people on the relation of the attorney general at the instance of a private person,[37] or where it is brought by the attorney general in the name of the state or people on his own information or on the complaint of a private person under a statutory remedy which supersedes the ancient writ of quo warranto or proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto.[38] So also, where the proceeding is against the incumbent and a claimant each defendant has the burden of proving matters essential to his claim to the office.[39] However, a judgment of ouster against the respondent does not establish the title of a private relator to the office,[40] and in a proceeding brought by a private relator to recover possession of an office, public or corporate, the relator has the burden of showing good title to the office in himself;[41] and in a proceeding by a private relator who is not a claimant of the office, the burden rests on him to show his interest or capacity to maintain the proceeding.[42] Similarly, where relator is asserting the right of a third person to an office he has the burden of showing not only respondent's lack of right, but also the legal right of such third person, to hold the office.[43]

The general rule stated above is not universally followed,[44] and in a few instances the burden of proving particular matters has been held to rest on plaintiff.[45] It has been held, under statute so providing, that it is the duty of the attorney general in whose name an information in the nature of quo warranto is filed to prove affirmatively all the facts alleged in the information.[46]

In any event, where defendant has introduced evidence sufficient to make a prima facie showing supporting his contention on a particular matter, the burden is cast on petitioner or relator to prove the contrary,[47] and to establish that his right should be recognized.[48]

In a proceeding by a private individual, the title of the present incumbent of the office will ordinarily be presumed to be good until the contrary is shown.[49] Thus, in the absence of a showing that the electors had either actual or constructive knowledge of defendant's alleged ineligibility when they voted, it will not be presumed that they willfully or obstinately threw away their votes by casting them for a candidate known to be ineligible [50] Similarly, where the legality and fairness of an election are not challenged, the relator has the burden of showing that defendant was ineligible as not of good character, since it will be presumed that the voters knew of such requirement, and that their vote recorded their judgment that he was of good character [51] However, where respondent forcibly obtained possession of the office in question, no presumption will be indulged in his favor by reason of his possession [52] It cannot be presumed that one filing an information in the nature of quo warranto to test the right of defendant to office did so in bad faith.[53] It will not be presumed that persons appointed to office after enactment of a statute giving them tenure waived the benefits thereof and accepted office for a fixed term [54] Where relator was appointed to office before the statutory time and respondent was appointed at the statutory time the presumption of appointment in accordance with the law will apply to the latter and not to the former.[55]

Corporate existence or franchise. Except in some jurisdictions,[56] and in special circumstances,[57] and except where the original incorporation was lawful, or the franchise was possessed at one time, and ouster or forfeiture is sought by reason of subsequent matters,[58] where the right to a corporate franchise is attacked, respondent must prove the existence of the franchise,[59] and the right to exercise it,[60] as well as facts showing compliance with all conditions precedent to the complete organization of the corporate body,[61] but, where the petition does not allege that defendant corporation was not created in accordance with statute, it will be presumed that the statutory requirements were complied with [62] So also, in a quo warranto proceeding against a municipal corporation, the burden is on defendant to prove the validity of its powers or the exercise thereof [63] Presumptions obtaining in civil proceedings generally have been held to obtain in quo warranto proceedings to determine corporate existence or franchise [64] Thus, where the validity of an ordinance annexing property is involved, any doubt is required to be resolved in favor of the ordinance [65] Where many years have elapsed since the organization of a drainage district, it will be presumed that its ditches and drains have been constructed,[66] and that the lands within its boundaries have been assessed to pay for such construction.[67] The acts of directors in reincorporating, pursuant to statutory provisions, to perfect an incomplete organization will be presumed to have been authorized by the members of the body, where it appears that thereafter the body acted as a corporation.[68]

License to practice profession. In a quo warranto proceeding to exclude a person from practicing a profession without a license or certificate the state or relator has been held to have the burden of proving the matters charged as usurpation,[69] at least where respondent interposes a general denial.[70] However, if respondent admits the acts charged or relator proves them, the burden of justification is on the respondent,[71] that is, the burden shifts to him to prove that he is authorized, by a proper license or certificate, to practice.[72]

The trial procedure in quo warranto proceedings is not necessarily the same as that in civil actions generally.

Since quo warranto is an extraordinary remedy, as discussed supra § 2, the trial procedure therein is not necessarily the same as that in civil actions generally.[73] Thus, the statutory requirements of service of notice of trial applicable in ordinary civil actions do not apply in quo warranto proceedings;[74] and on the ground that it is a summary proceeding it has been held that ordinary rules as to statutory time for trial are not necessarily applicable.[75] Under a statutory provision to that effect, where the prosecuting attorney, by whom a quo warranto proceeding was properly instituted, is absent the court may appoint a member of the bar to act as special prosecutor to present the case.[76]

§ 45. —— Scope of Inquiry and Powers of Court

a. In general

b. In proceedings relating to corporations

c. In proceedings relating to office

a. In General

In a quo warranto action or proceeding the court will decide all questions properly arising in the controversy and involved in the final result, subject to the rule that the scope of inquiry and decision extends, and is limited, to questions which have properly been put in issue

On a trial in a quo warranto action or proceeding, the court will decide all questions properly arising in the controversy and involved in the final result,[77] subject to the rule that the scope of inquiry and decision extends,[78] and is limited,[79] to the questions which have properly been put in issue by the pleadings. Accordingly, the court is without jurisdiction to adjudicate the rights of persons who are not parties to the proceedings;[80] the motives of the attorney general in applying for the writ may not be questioned by the court;[81] and title to property cannot be litigated or determined in a quo warranto proceeding.[82]

b. In Proceedings Relating to Corporations

In a quo warranto proceeding to determine the existence or powers of a corporation, the court is interested only in whether the corporation is validly incorporated, and whether it may properly exercise the powers in issue.

In accordance with the general rule, stated supra subdivision a of this section, that the scope of inquiry and decision in a quo warranto proceeding or action extends and is limited to questions which have been properly put in issue, in a proceeding to determine the existence or powers of a corporation the court is interested only in whether the corporation is validly incorporated, and whether it may properly exercise the powers in issue.[83] Various matters have been held to be beyond the scope of inquiry in a quo warranto proceeding brought to challenge or terminate the existence of a public or private corporation, or a corporate franchise, or particular powers,[84] including the motives or intentions of organizers or corporators,[85] the rights of stockholders,[86] the acts of stockholders who are not parties to the proceeding,[87] taxation matters,[88] matters of regulation and supervision of the corporation,[89] and the existence of another corporation.[90] Where an adjudication is made against defendant, the court has no power to determine that there has never been a de facto corporation[91] or that its acts under color of its supposed character are void.[92]

In a quo warranto proceeding to determine whether a municipal corporation had a certain power or the right to exercise such power the court will not inquire into the actual exercise of the power;[93] and the acts of the corporation's officials in the exercise of the power are not open to inquiry.[94] In a proceeding involving the legality of the organization of a district, it is immaterial whether particular tracts of land, inaccurately described in certain portions of the organization proceedings, are properly within the district,[95] and, where the district was established by an order or decree of court, the only question to be considered in a quo warranto proceeding is whether the court had jurisdiction.[96] In a proceeding relating to the incorporation of a municipality, the court will give consideration or special attention to the needs of the community in the light of what may reasonably be expected in the future.[97]

Municipal annexation of land. In a proceeding to determine the validity of an annexation of certain lands by a municipal corporation the court can construe the statute authorizing the annexation and determine whether it had been misapplied;[98] but the court will not inquire into the city council's knowledge of the territory[99] or the motives or intentions of petitioners for annexation.[1] Where an area has existed for many years as a village, its suitability for municipal government, for annexation to a city, is no longer open to question.[2]

Irregularities in an election to authorize or approve the exercise of a power by a municipal corporation cannot be considered, where such irregularities do not appear to have affected the result of the election;[3] and disregard of the election laws will not be considered where the provisions violated are directory and not mandatory.[4]

Alleged invalidity of city charter amendments adopted at an election may be inquired into,[5] and should be passed on,[6] in a proceeding brought in pursuance of a statute allowing it to be instituted wherever any material fraud or error has been committed at an election on a proposition.

In proceeding to oust foreign corporation, the action of the proper officials in refusing respondent's application for a license to transact business in the state will not be reviewed;[7] nor will the contracts of the corporation made within the state be annulled.[8] However, the court must look through the forms of the transactions to determine whether defendant was engaged in a business for which a license, permission, or charter power is required.[9]

c. In Proceedings Relating to Office

In a quo warranto proceeding to test the right to an office, the scope of inquiry and decision is ordinarily limited to the validity of defendant's title to the office; collateral matters or matters outside the scope of the action will not be investigated or adjudicated.

In accordance with the general rule, stated supra subdivision a of this section, that the scope of inquiry and decision in a quo warranto proceeding or action extends and is limited to questions which have properly been put in issue, in a proceeding to test a person's authority to exercise an office, the primary and fundamental question is whether defendant is legally entitled to hold the office involved,[10] and not as to the rights of any other person who may claim it.[11] The court may determine whether defendant has the qualifications expressly required by constitutional or statutory provisions;[12] and, if illegality in his election is charged, the validity of the election may be examined in all respects concerning the office involved,[13] it being permissible,[14] except in some jurisdictions,[15] to go behind the returns or certificates and, except in some jurisdictions,[16] to extend the inquiry even to the ballots.[17] In the case of an officer of a private corporation, the records of the corporation are determinative and must be considered.[18]

In adjudging the right to hold public office, the court considers only the title,[19] and there is no adjudication of official rights,[20] or powers,[21] or of the right to the salary or emoluments of the office,[32] although it has been held, in a proceeding to test the right of judges to hold office and exercise jurisdiction, that the validity of the jurisdiction conferred is necessarily a matter for consideration.[23] Conversely, while in a proceeding therefor it is proper for the court to inquire into whether certain officers are attempting to exercise a power which has not been given them,[24] if the purpose is to determine the right of an officer to exercise a particular function, the legality of his election is not subject to inquiry.[25] Similarly, where the proceeding depends on the validity of the removal of respondent from office by proper authority, the court will not inquire into his appointment or election or his qualifications to hold the office.[26] In a quo warranto proceeding by one removed from office against the incumbent appointed as his successor, the court may inquire into the sufficiency of the charges and findings on which the removal was made,[27] but only to determine whether there was any evidence to sustain the judgment of the removing officer.[28] However, after an officer has gone to trial on charges preferred against him, without objection to their sufficiency, and the issues have been found against him, resulting in his removal from office, he cannot, by quo warranto proceedings, raise the objection that the charges were not sufficiently specific.[29]

Matters which are merely collateral will not be investigated;[30] nor will matters which are entirely outside the scope of the action be decided.[31] Thus, the court may not adjudicate the rights of persons who are not parties to the proceedings.[32] So, also, where respondent's title rests on an appointment, the court will not go back of the power of appointment to inquire into the title of the appointing officer,[33] or into his reasons and motives for making the appointment,[34] or for removing the prior appointee,[35] nor will it inquire into the right or title of a member of a board which appointed,[36] or which confirmed the appointment of,[37] respondent. However, the jurisdiction of a board to make an appointment may be inquired into.[38]

Application of constitutional provision not determinable

In original proceedings in quo warranto to try right to office of directors of water conservancy district, court could not determine, in view of state of administrative development of district, whether constitution authorizing county commissioners to establish water rates was applicable to water conservancy district in exercise of power to sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of water, to fix rates for water disposed of, and to levy assessments.—People ex rel. 38. Ohio.—State v. McClymon, 7 Ohio Dec., Reprint, 109, 1 Cinc.L. Bul. 116.

If a forfeiture is claimed by reason of facts arising subsequent to a valid election, the court may inquire thereinto, even though misconduct is charged which constitutes a criminal offense of which defendant has not been convicted,[39] but the question whether one person has forfeited his right to the office of judge cannot be determined in a quo warranto proceeding against another person chosen judge pro tempore,[40] and in at least one jurisdiction it has been held that charges of misfeasance in office cannot be tried by the highest court of the state.[41]

Legal existence of office or body. In some jurisdictions it is held that, in an action against an individual for exercising unlawfully an office in a municipality, not only the question of the legal existence of the office,[42] but also that of the corporation itself,[43] may be tried and decided. However, in other jurisdictions, it has been held that the legal existence of a body to which respondent was appointed a member cannot be tried out in a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto,[44] and that certiorari is the normal remedy therefor;[45] and that the invalidity of an ordinance establishing a township office cannot be adjudicated in a quo warranto proceeding to try title to the office.[46] In a proceeding to test the right to an office in a private corporation, the inquiry may extend to the validity of the statute authorizing the office,[47] but not to the validity of the charter of the corporation.[48]

Matters pertaining to relator Where the relator is a claimant of the office, it has been held that the only question presented is whether he or respondent has the right to the office;[49] but it has also been held that only the relator's title is in question,[50] so that the court is not concerned with the strength or weakness of respondent's title.[51] When a relator seeks to avail himself of such an extraordinary remedy as quo warranto the courts are justified in viewing his application with scrutinizing eyes,[52] especially where it appears that the one whose office is attacked is serving the public interests without compensation.[53]

§ 46. —— Mode and Conduct of Trial

Ordinarily material and disputed issues of fact may be submitted to a jury for trial. In original proceedings in the highest court of the state, the court tries the facts as well as determines the law.

Questions held for jury

(1) Where information in quo warranto proceeding instituted in supreme court charged that governor elect was not citizen of United States and that he had not resided five years next preceding election within state, and respondent denied such averments, questions of fact, properly triable to jury, were held presented.—State ex rel. Sathre v. Moodie, 258 N.W. 558, 65 N.D. 340.

(2) In quo warranto proceeding to forfeit charter of corporation chartered to do a general advertising business on ground that business conducted by corporation was ultra vires, and was not advertising business, whether corporation's business came within meaning of term "advertising" as understood by those engaged in the business was for jury.—State v. Guardian Foundation of Texas, Tex.Civ.App., 128 S.W.2d 880, error dismissed, judgment correct.

(3) In quo warranto proceeding to determine tenure of defendant's second term as judge, where defendant on day he was appointed to second term signed an undated resignation to take effect at governor's pleasure, which resignation governor at later date received and accepted, and defendant contended that he delivered resignation to state house before he was appointed to second term and withdrew it before governor accepted it, question whether resignation was given before or after beginning of second term was for jury.—Huber

mitted[55] A question of intent should be withheld from the jury where any deduction could rest only on conjecture, and not on any reasonable inference,[56] and, if the facts are conceded, there is nothing for a jury to try[57] Accordingly, an affirmative charge may be given, or a verdict may be directed, for the state or people where the evidence in behalf of plaintiff is direct, positive, and undisputed,[58] and there is no evidence of a defense,[59] or the evidence of a defense is insufficient to go to the jury,[60] but not otherwise[61]

Original proceeding in appellate court. In a proceeding brought originally in the highest court of the state, the court tries the facts,[65] as well as determines the law[66] While the court may appoint a commissioner to take evidence and make findings of fact and conclusions of law,[67] where final judgment is entered on the pleadings on motions therefor, in accordance with the rules discussed supra § 40, the motion of a party for the appointment of a commissioner will be overruled.[68] When a commissioner has been appointed, his findings of fact are advisory only,[69] and, although entitled to consideration,[70] are not binding,[71] and the court has ample power and the duty to go behind the findings and examine the evidence,[72] not only where exceptions to the findings are filed,[73] but even where the findings are in favor of defendant as to a particular cause of action and counsel for the state concedes that the evidence is not sufficient to

Jury finding properly disregarded
In quo warranto proceeding to annul annexation of territory to municipality, trial court under the undisputed facts in evidence properly disregarded jury's finding that sole purpose of suit was enforcement of individual rights of relator, where relator owned only a small portion of annexed territory.—Town of De Kalb v. Question held one of law on agreed facts support that cause of action.[74] Accordingly, even though the reception of evidence by the commissioner was error, it would not require the recommittal of the case to the commissioner.[75] Similarly, where a referee is appointed to make findings of fact, his rulings on the proceeding are subject to review.[76] However, where exceptions to the commissioner's findings of fact are not briefed, they are abandoned.[77]

In some jurisdictions,[78] but not others,[79] the case may be sent down to the circuit court of the county where the controversy arose, for the trial of issues.

§ 47. New Trial or Rehearing

A new trial may be granted in a quo warranto proceeding on the same grounds and on the same showing as in civil cases generally.

A new trial may be granted in a quo warranto proceeding on the same grounds and on the same showing as in civil cases generally.[80] Thus, if a new trial is sought on the ground of newly discovered evidence, it must be shown that the newly discovered evidence is of such a character as seriously to affect the result;[81] and a new trial will not be granted on the ground that the verdict is against the evidence, unless the impropriety of the verdict is clearly shown.[82] Grounds of a motion for new trial which are not urged or argued are deemed waived.[83]

Time for making motion. A motion for a new trial should be timely,[84] and it will not be granted where it appears at the time of the motion that the term of the office which is being litigated has expired.[85]

§ 48. Judgment and Enforcement Thereof

The judgment to be entered in quo warranto proceedings is either a judgment quashing or denying the writ or a judgment of ouster, and it is subject to the rules governing judgments and decrees in civil actions generally.

The judgment to be entered in quo warranto proceedings is either a judgment quashing or denying the writ or a judgment of ouster;[86] and each case must be decided on the facts peculiar to it.[87] A judgment of ouster from the franchise or office involved is proper when it is made to appear that defendant's use or occupancy is illegal,[88] or, in jurisdictions wherein the burden of proof rests on defendant, as discussed supra § 43 b, when he fails to sustain his plea by proof showing his right or title to the office or franchise in question.[89] Where, however, the burden is on the relator to establish good title to an office in himself, if he fails to sustain such burden, judgment for respondent is proper.[90] If defendant appears and pleads, a trial of the issues must be had, before the court will be authorized to enter a judgment of ouster,[91] unless defendant withdraws his plea,[92] or unless, as considered supra § 40, a demurrer thereto is sustained.

Where plaintiff in quo warranto sues a corporation and challenges its right to exercise certain powers and it appears that the legality of the organization of the corporation is in issue, plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment against the corporation,[93] because he cannot sue the corporation as such and at the same time be permitted to show that it has no corporate existence.[94] Similarly, the court cannot enter a judgment against the individuals exercising the franchise of a nonexistent corporation and at the same time enter a judgment against the corporation.[95]

The judgment or decree in quo warranto proceedings is subject to the rules governing judgments and decrees in civil actions generally.[96] The application to judgments in quo warranto proceedings of the general rule that judgments must conform to pleadings, issues, and proof, is discussed in Judgments § 51 d; and the necessity of proof to sustain a judgment by default in quo warranto proceedings, in Judgments § 213 a. Since an ouster is in effect an order to cease and desist from the exercise of the franchise or power in issue, as discussed infra § 50 a, a provision in a judgment that respondents should be enjoined from such exercise is unnecessary,[97] and, as considered in Judgments § 84, will not necessarily invalidate the judgment.

Where actual legal results of election are duly established by pleadings or proofs in a proper quo warranto proceeding, it is the duty of the court to award judgment in accordance with the law and the established facts.[98]

Judgment on verdict. Defendant is entitled to a judgment in his favor and against the state where a verdict has been rendered in his favor in a proceeding instituted by the attorney general, in his official capacity, on behalf of the state.[99]

§ 49. —— Scope and Extent of Relief

a. In general
b. In proceeding against corporation
c. In proceeding against incumbent of office

a. In General

The relief that may be granted in a quo warranto proceeding is limited by the nature of the action, and depends on the pleading and proof. A fine may generally be imposed

The relief that may be granted in a quo warranto proceeding is limited by the nature of the action.[2] Thus, it is not within the legitimate scope of the relief afforded by such proceedings to declare null and void what may have been done,[3] but only to affirm or adjudge as unauthorized the franchise or power which may have been, with or without color of right, unlawfully exercised.[4] The relief to be granted does not necessarily depend on the relator's theory of appropriate relief,[5] or the prayer for relief,[6] although it has also been held that the lack of a proper prayer may, under some circumstances, result in a refusal of the ouster;[7] but rather it depends on the general purpose of the proceeding,[8] the allegations of the complaint,[9] and the evidence.[10]

While a judgment will be limited so as not unnecessarily to impose too great a burden on respondent,[11] the scope of the judgment may not be limited except for good cause.[12]

Discretion of court. It has been held that, where a court has discretion in granting or refusing a judgment of ouster in a quo warranto proceeding, as discussed supra § 6, the character and terms of the judgment are largely within the discretion of the court,[13] taking all material facts into consideration.[14]

In assessing the punishment in quo warranto proceeding to oust or punish stock fire insurance companies because agent of companies, in order to settle litigation against companies, bribed superintendent of insurance, court would take into consideration fact that impounded funds in litigation were restored and paid

Fine. In general, the court may impose a fine in addition to, or in lieu of, ouster,[15] and in some,[16] but not all,[17] jurisdictions a substantial fine may be imposed. However, the propriety of imposing a fine is usually regarded as a matter of sound judicial discretion,[18] and ordinarily the fine will be omitted,[19] or limited to a nominal amount.[20]

In proceeding under ancient common-law writ of quo warranto, a judgment for the king was that the franchise be seized in his hands,[21] if it was of such a nature as to subsist in his hands;[22] and, if not, the judgment was merely one of ouster.[23] In case of judgment for defendant, he was allowed the franchise.[24]

b. In Proceeding against Corporation

In a proceeding against a corporation, the court may enter judgment of ouster as to the franchise or merely as to particular powers, and may oust the officers from the exercise of their functions.

In a proceeding against a corporation, the court may enter a judgment of ouster as to the corporate franchise or merely as to particular powers,[25] or as to the exercise of powers in certain places;[26] and, if the corporation is dissolved, the court may order incidentally that the officers shall no longer exercise the functions of their offices.[27] However,

In action in nature of quo warranto by plaintiff gas company, which had been occupying field in city for many years, challenging validity of resolutions extending territory of defendant gas company, supreme court, in exercise of its discretion, would not oust defendant from streets already occupied by virtue of resolutions, notwithstanding resolutions were invalid, but would enjoin defendant from doing any further construction work in streets covered by resolutions.—Gas Service Co. v. Consolidated Gas Utilities Corporation, supra.

27. Vt.—State v. Bradford, 32 Vt. 50.

the forfeiture of the franchises of the corporation and the ouster of its officers from the exercise of official power constitute the limits of the relief which may be granted,[28] although, as appears supra subdivision a of this section, it is generally held that a fine may also be imposed. It is not erroneous for the court to oust a municipal corporation from jurisdiction over a parcel of land without declaring the statute conferring such jurisdiction void in toto.[29]

In view of the seriousness of the forfeiture of a corporate charter, courts proceed with caution when such relief is asked,[30] and, even where a corporation is guilty of improper conduct, the court may determine that under all the facts forfeiture of the charter is not warranted.[31]

Allowance of time for compliance. In a proper case the court may and should grant the corporation a reasonable time within which to comply with the statutes, so as to minimize the resulting hardships,[32] and may reserve jurisdiction for such period to entertain motions and make such orders as it may deem appropriate,[33] and may provide for the entry of a judgment of ouster and liquidation of the business of the corporation if at the end of the time allowed it has taken no steps for compliance.[34]

Appointment of trustee or receiver. In a proper case the court may, on judgment of ouster, appoint a trustee to discharge a trust partly performed by a corporation.[35] In a quo warranto proceeding brought for the forfeiture of the franchise, and dissolution of a corporation holding land in excess of a restriction contained in a statute which also provides that such land may, in the option of the people, be confiscated or be sold at public auction, the court, under general receivership statutes, has the power, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to appoint a receiver to handle the property until the option is exercised.[36]

c. In Proceeding against Incumbent of Office

Under statute the court may not only oust the wrongful possessor of an office, but may place the relator therein; and the judgment may include the franchises, privileges, and emoluments of the office.

When granting relief against one exercising an office, the court, which will go no further under its common law powers than to oust the wrongful possessor of the office, will not give possession thereof to the relator or any other person,[37] or order respondent to deliver the records and equipment of the office to the relator.[38] However, under or without reference to statutes so providing, the relator's title may be adjudicated if it is put in issue by respondent,[39] and, if the relator succeeds, and makes a clear showing as to the right to the office, the proper judgment is that defendant be ousted and the relator,[40] or a claimant joined as defendant under statutory authority,[41] placed in possession of the office, although the relator will not be installed where he is not entitled to the office, even though defendant is ousted.[42]

A judgment awarding an office to claimant or the relator may include its franchises, privileges, and emoluments,[43] may direct respondent to deliver to the relator all the records, property, and emblems which belong to the office and are in the custody of respondent;[44] and in a proper case may, under or apart from statutes so providing, include damages against respondent for loss of fees or salary to the relator by reason of being deprived of the office.[45] However, a judgment for salary cannot be upheld where it is not supported by either the pleadings or the evidence.[46] The judgment of ouster may be limited to defendant's present term of office,[47] so that, as discussed infra § 50 c, defendant may serve a subsequent term.

Order for new election Where the case is within the terms of a statute conferring authority to do so,[48] but not otherwise,[49] the court may order the holding of a new election.

Retention of powers by defendant. A judgment which both ousts defendant from office and provides that he shall retain certain powers cannot stand.[50]

Injunction. In a proper case, the court in a quo warranto proceeding may, as ancillary aid to an action at law, issue an injunction restraining an alleged usurper from performing the duties of office.[51]

Illegally incorporated municipality. In a proceeding brought against individuals who are purporting to act as officers of a village, and based on the ground that the incorporation of the village is illegal, the judgment may properly contain a recital of the finding of the court that the attempted incorporation of the village is void;[52] but the judgment to be rendered on the finding should be merely one of ouster of defendants from the offices which they are assuming to fill,[53] and should not adjudge that the village be disincorporated.[54]

proceedings has been construed as meaning that the person or corporation ousted from any claimed franchise or power should cease and desist from exercising such franchise or power.[55] If respondents persist in exercising the functions from which they have been so ousted, the established remedy is through proceedings as for contempt of court,[56] and rules governing contempt proceedings generally apply to such proceedings for the enforcement of a judgment in quo warranto proceedings.[57] In determining what will constitute obedience to a judgment or order in quo warranto proceedings, the judgment or order must be fairly construed;[58] and, where there is more than one way of complying with a judgment or order, it should not be construed as requiring that it be complied with only in a particular way.[59]

A judgment of ouster rendered in a quo warranto action or proceeding is not retroactive,[60] but the judgment of ouster may be made to take effect as of the date of the filing of the information on which the proceeding is based.[61]

Conclusiveness In general, the judgment is binding and conclusive on parties to the proceeding,[62] and is not binding on persons or organizations who are not parties thereto.[63] Judgment on ancient common law writ of quo warranto was conclusive,[64] even on the crown.[65]

Vacation of judgment. In accordance with rules governing the vacation of judgments in civil actions generally, discussed in Judgments §§ 265-310, a judgment in a quo warranto proceeding may, in the discretion of the court, be vacated in a proper case;[66] but it will not be vacated on a mere technicality, at least where no useful purpose would be served thereby.[67]

Judgment excluding defendant from practice of profession will be construed not to prevent him from practicing after he obtains a license or certificate.[68]

A motion to vacate judgment of ouster by default in quo warranto proceeding was addressed to discretion of supreme court; and, apart from the inherent power of the court to open a default judgment, if its enforcement would defeat the ends of justice with respect to the individual litigants, the public interest demands that controversies as to title to public office be adjudicated on the merits to the end that an intruder be ejected. b. Judgments against Corporations

A judgment of ouster immediately dissolves a municipal corporation and takes away all its rights, liberties, privileges, and franchises; but it has been held not to affect rights previously acquired and the powers incidental thereto A judgment against a private corporation may oust the officers personally from the usurpation of the franchise involved

The effect of a judgment of ouster against a municipal corporation is immediately to dissolve the corporation,[69] work its dissolution,[70] and take away all its rights, liberties, privileges, and franchises,[71] and the judgment of dissolution operates as an absolute revocation of all power and authority on the part of others to act in its name or behalf.[72] However, it has been held that it does not affect rights previously acquired;[73] and that a judgment dissolving a municipal corporation does not destroy the powers necessary to protect the rights of the corporation,[74] such as, at least with respect to validated bonds under a statute providing that bonds which have been judicially validated may never be called in question in subsequent legal proceedings, its taxing powers.[75] Moreover, apart from statute, a judgment to oust a municipal corporation from jurisdiction over certain lands does not affect the authority of the corporation to impose lawful taxation on such lands proportionately to pay indebtedness incurred prior to the judgment of ouster and for public municipal improvements beneficial to such lands;[76] and such a judgment does not affect the rights of holders of municipal bonds, where such lands were included within the municipality when the bonds were issued,[77] and the bondholders are not parties to the action.[78] Furthermore, notwithstanding a judgment ousting a municipal corporation from exercising jurisdiction over certain territory, the municipality may, under certain circumstances, retain de facto jurisdiction thereof.[79]

A judgment declaring void all orders theretofore issued by a school board with respect to annexing or grouping the district is binding on all the parties affected thereby,[80] although it does not deprive the board of the right to thereafter proceed to create a new district under authority of statute.[81]

As to private corporations or associations. A judgment of ouster in a suit against a corporation or association and its officers from the usurpation of a franchise may in a proper case operate as an ouster of the officers personally from such usurpation,[82] so that the officers are thereafter excluded from the exercise of such franchise directly or indirectly,[83] and the organization by the officers of another corporation or association for the same purposes constitutes a violation of the judgment.[84] However, after a judgment of ouster and dissolution has been rendered against a private corporation, it is a matter of indifference to the state that a new corporation, complying with the general law relating to the organization of corporations, has appropriated and is using the name of the extinct corporation.[85] Moreover, the judgment cannot bind persons who are not parties to the proceedings.[86] Where a money judgment has issued in quo warranto proceedings, corporations to which defendant corporation has transferred its assets in order to defeat collection of such judgment will be liable, at least to the extent of the assets received by them, for such money judgment.[87]

Confiscation or sale of property. Under a statute so providing, where a corporation is unlawfully holding realty the state may at its option, in the same quo warranto proceeding, and within a specified period after the judgment of dissolution becomes final, institute in its behalf the confiscation of such property or the sale thereof at public auction,[88] and the final judgment shall fix the reasonable price to be paid for such property.[89]

c. Judgments in Proceedings Relating to Office

A judgment of ouster against the incumbent of an office determines that he is not entitled thereto, ousts him at once, and in some instances establishes the relator's title to the office. It is self-executing, and binding on the parties.

The legal effect of a judgment of ouster against a person in possession of an office is to determine that he is not entitled to the office,[90] and to oust him,[91] at once,[92] so that, while the judgment does not affect the previous official acts of the incumbent, and bears no relation thereto,[93] any subsequent acts as such officer will be invalid.[94] However, a judgment against defendant because his term has expired will not prevent his continuing to act until a successor is qualified, as provided by statute;[95] and, where a judgment of ouster is limited to the present term of office, defendant will not be precluded from serving a subsequent term to which he has been elected subsequent to the institution of the quo warranto proceeding.[96] A judgment of ouster against some of the trustees of a religious corporation does not invalidate the title to the office of the remaining trustees.[97]

In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary,[98] the judgment is self executing,[99] and requires no process to enforce it;[1] and the appointing power can immediately fill the office by appointment of some qualified person.[2]

When judgment of dissolution becomes final

Under statute providing that when any corporation is unlawfully holding realty in the jurisdiction the people may, at its option, through the same quo warranto proceedings brought for dissolution, institute in its behalf the confiscation of such property, or the alienation thereof at public auction, within a term of not more than six months counting from the date on which final sentence is rendered, the people have six months after the judgment of dissolution becomes final within which to apply for confiscation or sale of property, and, hence, a judgment of dissolution did not become a "final judgment" until a mandate of the United States supreme court was received by the clerk of the supreme court of the jurisdiction.—Rubert Hermanos, Inc. v. People of Puerto Rico, C.C.A.Puerto Rico, 118 F.2d 752, reversed on other grounds People of Puerto Rico v. Rubert Hermanos, Inc., 62 S.Ct. 771, 315 U.S. 637, 86 L.Ed. 1081.

Final decree of nullity distinguished

The statute providing that when the decree of nullity of acts of a corporation sought to be dissolved by quo warranto proceedings affects realty and the people have chosen to confiscate it or order it sold at public auction, the final judgment shall fix the reasonable price to be paid therefor, does not necessarily mean that there should be only one final judgment in the course of the proceedings, but there may be a final decree of nullity and a final judgment ordering sale and fixing the reasonable price to be paid. Effect on rights of claimant to office. While ouster of the occupant does not of itself adjudge the rights of a claimant to the office,[3] or actually put him in possession thereof,[4] in some instances the decision may establish relator's right to the office.[5] Thus, the decision may necessarily involve a holding that he was illegally removed by the governor,[6] and leave him entitled to possession of the office,[7] and, where he is expressly adjudged to be entitled to the office, he becomes eo instanti invested with it on qualifying as required by law,[8] or, where he has previously qualified, on the filing of the judgment.[9] Under a statute so providing, a party obtaining a judgment for possession of an office is entitled, on giving bond, to an order directing the surrender of the office by respondent.[10]

Conclusiveness and binding effect. The judgment is binding on the state or people,[11] parties,[12] claimants who are parties,[13] and a successor standing in the shoes of defendant.[14] On the other hand, a judgment in a quo warranto proceeding does not conclude persons or corporations who are not parties to the proceeding;[15] and an adjudication of the right of a claimant to an office for a specified time does not determine the right of a successor to the office holding by appointment from the same authority for a different term.[16] A judgment of removal from office is not res judicata as to defendant's citizenship in a subsequent suit wherein there is a different adverse party.[17]

Subject to some exceptions, the general rules governing appeal and error in civil actions have been applied in proceedings to review quo warranto proceedings.[18] Thus, an appeal or writ of error will generally lie under the statutes from a judgment or order in a quo warranto proceeding, if it disposes of the case, so that it is a final one,[19] but not otherwise.[20] So, also, it has been held that proper exceptions are necessary to obtain a review of orders or rulings in quo warranto proceedings;[21] and a bill of exceptions must be prepared and submitted in accordance with statutory requirements.[22] Moreover, an appeal may be dismissed where the question in issue has become moot,[23] but a quo warranto proceeding to test title to office has been held not to become moot by the termination of the term for which defendant claimed he was elected to office.[24] In view of the summary nature of the proceeding, it has been held that ordinary statutory times for appellate court procedure are not necessarily applicable;[25] but there must be a compliance with rules as to the time for filing a transcript and statement of facts on appeal in quo warranto proceedings.[26] Under rules to that effect, the appellate court must give preference to appeals in quo warranto proceedings and hear and determine them as early as practicable.[27]

Where respondent has been brought into court by its corporate name and so appeared and pleaded, its corporate existence cannot be questioned on review in the appellate court;[28] and, where the record discloses that the relator's right to participate in the proceedings was not questioned, the proceeding will be regarded as one properly instituted by a proper party.[29]

The application of various general rules of review to the review of quo warranto proceedings is discussed in Appeal and Error. Thus, for example, the application of the rule that the appellate court will not consider matters not raised in the lower court is discussed in § 240 of that title; and the effect of an appeal, or writ of error, or supersedeas bond as staying a judgment of ouster is discussed in § 632 d.

Who may appeal. Subject to the qualification that appellant must be a party in interest who is aggrieved by the decision,[30] and, in some jurisdictions, subject to the further qualification that the relator alone may not appeal,[31] an appeal in quo warranto proceedings may be taken by either party.[32]

b. Review and Disposition

In general there is no hearing de novo on appeal in quo warranto proceedings, and general rules as to the scope of review apply.

While in those jurisdictions in which quo warranto proceedings are regarded as equitable in nature, as discussed supra § 2, statements set forth in the judgment of the trial court are advisory only, and not conclusive on appeal,[33] in general, since the proceeding is regarded as legal in nature, there is no hearing and determination de novo on appeal;[34] and on an appeal from an order quash-

ing a writ of quo warranto, the review is the same as on certiorari[35]

Rules governing the scope and extent of review on appeals in civil actions generally, discussed in Appeal and Error §§ 1453–1834, have been applied in appeals in quo warranto proceedings[36] Thus, the appellate court will not consider and decide matters which are not within the issues raised by the pleadings,[37] and where it holds that the information does not state a cause of action for removal of an officer, it need not decide whether a statutory remedy of impeachment is cumulative or exclusive.[38] The action of the trial court in sustaining a demurrer to the petition is reviewable on appeal from a judgment of nonsuit;[39] but, in reviewing such an order, the court cannot consider facts not alleged in the petition.[40] Where only some of the owners of several tracts of land appeal from a judgment in a proceeding to test the legality of an annexation of the lands to a district, appellants may not complain of error in,[41] and the court is without jurisdiction to review,[42] the judgment as to the lands of the persons who do not appeal.

Judicial discretion of the court to grant or refuse leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto,[43] or to vacate or refuse to vacate an order granting leave,[44] or to grant or refuse the issuance of the writ,[45] is subject to review; but, in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion, such action of the court will not be disturbed[46] Stated otherwise, it has been held that the appellate court will not review the discretion exercised by the court of original jurisdiction unless it plainly appears that its discretion has been abused.[47]

It will be presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the trial court investigated and ascertained the capacity of the relator to sue before granting leave to file the information.[48]

Disposition of cause. Under some statutes the reviewing court possesses broad power as to the disposition of the cause.[49] In a proper case the judgment of the lower court may be reversed,[50] but a judgment will not be reversed merely to permit the imposition of a nominal fine.[51] On reversal of a judgment for the relator the reviewing court may compel the relator to surrender to defendant all the books, papers, and insignia belonging or appertaining to the office in question.[52] In view of the summary character of the proceeding it has been held that the appellate court may order a dismissal of the suit in the lower court[53]

Motion for rehearing. In view of the summary character of the proceeding, the appellate court has discretion summarily to refuse to permit the filing of a motion for a rehearing,[54] and, for the same reason, ordinary statutory times allowed for such motions are not necessarily applicable, and the court can limit the time allowed.[55] A motion for rehearing by the appellate court will be denied where the prosecuting attorney declines to join with relator in the motion and where he is a necessary party plaintiff.[56]

§ 52. Costs

Subject to some exceptions, such as that costs cannot be awarded against the state, the unsuccessful party is liable for costs in a quo warranto proceeding, and may be required to furnish bond therefor.

Under the statutes of the different jurisdictions, and the construction placed thereon, it is a general rule that the successful party is entitled to,

and the unsuccessful party is liable for, costs in a quo warranto action or proceeding.[57] However, costs cannot be adjudged against persons not before the court,[58] and it has been held that, if there is no relator in the proceedings, the occupant of an office, although ousted, should not be ordered to pay costs.[59] Moreover, under a statute authorizing the court to adjudge such costs as are equitable, it may be proper not to award costs to either party under the circumstances of the particular case.[60] It has been held that costs will not be allowed where a public question is involved.[61]

Costs cannot be awarded against the people[62] or against a state prosecutor appearing as relator or prosecuting the proceeding in his official capacity;[63] nor need such an officer furnish a bond for costs.[64]

When so provided by statute, a private relator must file a bond for costs[65] before the commencement of the suit,[66] and he is liable for costs where judgment is rendered for defendant.[67] However, in the absence of a statute so providing, costs cannot be recovered from the relator;[68] and even under a statute providing for payment of costs by the relator under some circumstances, costs should not be imposed on an individual where, although his name appears in the title as relator, he was not authorized by the court to prosecute the action and the action was actually commenced and prosecuted by the county attorney.[69] Certainly costs should not be taxed against individuals named as relators where they have no interest in the proceeding other than that common to all citizens.[70] It has been both affirmed[71] and denied[72] that costs may be properly imposed on the relator where he had good ground for instituting the proceeding and would have prevailed but for matters which arose after the institution of the proceeding and resulted in a judgment for respondent.

Disclaimer or resignation. If an officer disclaims or resigns on application for the writ, the costs will not be assessed against him,[73] but he may properly be taxed with all costs accruing before the filing of his plea of disclaimer.[74]

An intervener may properly be charged with costs where judgment is rendered for the relator.[75]

On discharge of rule to show cause why a writ should not issue, costs should not be allowed defendant,[76] unless it is so provided by statute.[77]

Double costs should not be allowed.[78]

RABBIT. An animal of the hare family.[3] Regulatory measures applying to rabbits are treated in Game §§ 7, 10–12, 15, 18.

RABIES. A dread disease known from the earliest times, and referred to by Aristotle and other ancient writers as a well-known illness. It is an infectious disease of the central nervous system, the virus of which is present in the saliva of diseased animals and generally passes to a new host, animal or man, through wounds inflicted by a dog bite. It is incurable, but is in large measure preventable by control of the dog population.[4] The usual term for the disease in man is "hydrophobia."[5]

RACE. In one sense the word "race" connotes descent,[6] and it is frequently employed to denote the descendants of a common ancestor, or a family, tribe, people, or nation.[7] It is defined as meaning a descendant of a common ancestor;[8] a tribe, people, or nation,[9] belonging or supposed to belong to the same stock or lineage,[10] an ethnical stock,[11] an ethnical stock from a distinct, primitive source;[12] a tribal or national stock;[13] a tribal stock, or subdivision of the racial stocks of mankind.[14]

Races are commonly classified into five divisions, Caucasian, Mongolian, Ethiopian, American, and Malay.[15]

The word "race" is also employed in a sense which involves the idea of competitive locomotion, and when so employed it embraces every contest or trial of progression, including speed and endurance, one or both, whether in running, trotting, walking, driving, riding, or rowing.[16] It therefore includes a foot race, a horse race of any kind, an automobile race, a steamboat or yacht race, or any other form of competitive movement or progression.[17] Figuratively, or otherwise, the term may be and has been applied to a competitive action of any kind, as in the phrase "political race."[18]

The term is also defined as meaning a strong, rapid current of water.[19]

RACK. A framework, stand, or grating, on or in which articles are placed, as for keeping or display,[23] and which, for the purposes of a conveyance or mortgage, may be considered a part of the realty, as stated in Fixtures § 45.

Anciently, the term "rack" was applied to an engine of torture used in the inquisitorial method of examining persons charged with crime, the office of which was to break the limbs or dislocate the joints.[24]

Rack men. Newspaper distributors are known in the business as rack men.[25]

Rack-rent is a rent of the full value of the tenement, or near it;[26] a rent which represents the full annual value of the holding.[27]

RACKET. The word "racket" has several meanings,[28] and in one sense it signifies a confused, clattering noise.[29]

As a slang expression of recent origin,[30] the word "racket" has become a part of our language.[31] The term, in its slang sense, has various shades of meaning, and in and of itself conveys no definite or certain signification.[32] It may be innocently employed with no opprobrious connotation intended,[33] and is thus often used to describe one's vocation, business, or diversion; as, the football racket, the baseball racket, the comic-strip racket, the hair-dressing racket, or the prize fighting racket;[34] and a method of earning money easily out of certain things or litigation is sometimes denominated a "racket" even though there is nothing sinister or evil about the method.[35] However, in recent times the term has been employed in a more sinister sense,[36] and the word "racket" has a sinister meaning with which the general public is familiar.[37] In this sense the word "racket" is defined as meaning engaging in an occupation to make money illegitimately;[38] a dodge or trick; a fraudulent scheme, game, or the like, an imposture,[39] specifically, a system of obtaining money or other advantage fraudulently or undeservedly, usually with the outward consent of the victims; as, the fortune-telling racket, the alimony racket.[40]

The connection in which the word "racket" is used in its slang sense determines whether its connotation is innocent or derogatory,[41] and thus resort to the context of which it is a part must be had in order to determine the meaning of the term.[42] The term "racket" may indicate continuity of behavior,[43] or it may refer to a single incident.[44]

RACKETEER. The word "racketeer" connotes a criminal act,[45] and a racketeer is a person who makes money by violations of the penal law, particularly those violations which are accompanied by violence.[46] The term has been compared with, or distinguished from, "crook" see 24 C J S. p 1264 note 48.1.

"Racketeering" is defined as meaning an organized conspiracy to commit the crimes of extortion or coercion, or attempts to commit extortion or coercion, within the definition of these crimes as found in the penal law;[47] the organized use of threats, coercion, intimidation, and use of violence to compel the payment for actual or alleged services of arbitrary or excessive charges under the guise of membership dues, protection fees, royalties, or service rates, the cloak of blackmail and extortion.[48]

RACKETS. A game played in a court with an implement called a "racket," consisting in knocking a ball against a high wall and keeping the ball constantly in motion by striking the ball with the racket.[49]

RADIAL. Of or pertaining to a ray, as of light, or a radius, as of a circle or sphere, extending from a center in the manner of rays; as, the spokes of a wheel are radial; hence, figuratively, divergent.[50]

RADIATE. To emit or send forth in rays, as heat.[51]

RADIATION. The word "radiation" is defined as meaning an act or process of radiating, or state of being radiated; emission and diffusion of rays, as of light or heat.[52] It means something more than radiators, having reference to the heating capacity of radiators when connected up with a boiler.[53]

The term has been distinguished from "conduction" see 15 C.J.S. p 816 note 63, and "convection" see 18 C.J.S. p 37 note 71.

RADICAL. A term derived from the Latin,[54] and, as an adjective, defined as meaning having to do with or proceeding from the root, source, origin, or foundation; forming part of the essential nature; not accidental; fundamental.[55]

As a noun, and as a term of chemistry, the word "radical" is defined as meaning an atom or element, or a group of atoms or elements, that is the chief constituent of the molecules of a given compound

RADIUS. In common usage the term "radius" ordinarily signifies a distance or circular limit defined by a radius of specified length,[58] and it is loosely defined as any area bounded, or conceived of as bounded, by certain prescribed limits.[59] Standing alone,[60] and as defined in geometry,[61] a radius is a straight line extending from the center of a circle to its circumference[62] or surface.[63] "Radius" is also defined as meaning a straight line drawn from the center of a circle to any point of the circumference;[64] a right line extending from the center of a circle or sphere to the curve or surface;[65] a right line drawn or extending from the center of a circle to its periphery,[66] the semi-diameter of a circle or sphere [67]

The word is often used metaphorically, as when we speak of the radius of a man's commercial activities[68] or of one's social circle.[69]

Alkyl radicals
"If a hydrogen atom is thought of as being removed from the paraffin hydrocarbons, groups of atoms remain—called radicals which may combine with other atoms or groups of atoms to form derivatives, known as monovalent derivatives of the hydrocarbons. Those radicals are referred to as 'alkyl radicals' and are characterized by the ending ' yl': thus—methyl (CH_3); ethyl (C_2H_5); propyl (C_3H_7); butyl (C_4H_9); amyl (C_5H_{11}); hexyl (C_6H_{13}); heptyl (C_7H_{15}); octyl (C_8H_{17}), etc. The general formula of the alkyl radicals is C_nH_{2n} (where 'n' represents the number of carbon atoms)." (1) In General

A "railroad" has been defined as a road specially laid out and graded, having parallel rails of iron or steel for the wheels of carriages or cars, drawn by steam or other motive power, to run upon; the term has no definite and precise signification, either as to the character of the road, or the width, character, or amount of the structure, land, or property included, and such matters must be determined from the connection in which the term is used.

A "railroad" has been defined as a road specially laid out and graded, having parallel rails of iron or steel for the wheels of carriages or cars, drawn by steam or other motive power, to run upon,[1] and, more specifically, as such a road to the possession or ownership of which important franchises or rights affecting the public are attached.[2] In some jurisdictions, for particular purposes, the word has been defined by statute,[3] and it has been held that the word may have a different meaning in different statutes, since the legislature may use it in a broad sense in one statute and in a technical or popular sense in another.[4] The term "railway" ordinarily is used interchangeably with "railroad" and is regarded as synonymous therewith,[5] unless the con-

"Railway" defined

"A 'railway' is a way which is made for the movement of cars, or something of that character, upon tracks that are laid down either on the street or somewhere else, they are not propelled as ordinary vehicles, such as wagons and carriages, are on the highways generally, but require for their operation that tracks be expressly formed to be moved upon"—Minneapolis St. Ry.

ection in which it is used shows that a distinction as o the character of the road is intended.[6]

The term "railroad" has no definite and precise ignification, either as to the character of the road[7] r the width, character, or amount of the structure, nd, or property included;[8] and such matters must e determined from the connection in which the erm is used,[9] and the proper construction, purpose, nd intention of the constitutional provision,[10] statte,[11] or instrument[12] in which it appears. The erm is restricted, however, to a road on which the arriages or cars operate on rails.[13] Whether a oad is properly a railroad does not depend primarily n its charter,[14] its length,[15] its location, course, or irection,[16] the kind of motive power used,[17] its osition with reference to the surface of the round,[18] the character of its traffic,[19] whether it s owned by a railroad company,[20] the name asumed or borne by the company constructing or perating it,[21] or whether it is a common carrier,[22] but on the powers it exercises and its method of doing business.[23]

As track, right of way, or appurtenances. The term "railroad" is sometimes used to designate merely the track or rails,[24] or the roadbed upon which rails are laid,[25] or it may extend to the right of way[26] or the roadbed or right of way with its superstructure, exclusive of rolling stock and other property,[27] but it may also include other real and personal property used in connection with railroad operation[28] and so may comprehend the rolling stock[29] and all the lands, depots, shops, buildings, structures, and appurtenances incidental to the operation of the road and the transaction of its business.[30] Even in its extended sense, however, the term does not include property which is not necessarily an appendage of the railroad or of the business of transportation.[31] The term "railroad" ordinarily includes side tracks and spur tracks,[32] although such tracks have been said not to be designated as "railroads" in com-

"Railroad" is usually limited to roads for heavy steam transportation and also to steam roads partially or wholly electrified or roads for heavy traffic designed originally for electric traction, and lighter electric streetcar lines and like are usually termed railways.—Wisconsin Employment Relations Board v. As completed road. The term "railroad" may be so used as to mean the completed road ready for use, as distinguished from a merely graded roadway or partly constructed railroad[35] or from a franchise to construct a railroad.[36]

As railroad company. The term "railroad" is sometimes used as meaning "railroad company,"[37] or "railroad corporation,"[38] although properly it is to be distinguished therefrom, as discussed infra subdivision b of this section.

(2) Particular Kinds
- (a) In general
- (b) Lateral or branch railroad or line

(a) In General

The term "railroad" or "railway" is a generic term which includes all roads upon which the carriages or cars have wheels adapted to run, and which in operation do run, upon metallic rails, but the term ordinarily refers only to ordinary commercial railroads for the transportation of freight and passengers. The terms "belt railroad," "commercial railroad," "steam railroad," "tramroad," and "trunk railway" have also been defined.

Technically speaking the term "railroad" or "railway" is a generic term,[39] which includes all roads upon which the carriages or cars have wheels adapted to run, and which in operation do run, upon metallic rails.[40] While it may include street railroads and interurban railroads, as discussed infra subdivision a (3) of this section, the term standing alone ordinarily refers only to ordinary commercial railroads for the transportation of freight and passengers,[41] as distinguished also from a private tramway or railroad used only in the conduct of another business,[42] and from other ways or means of transportation,[43] and it is so used in this title.

Belt railroad. A railroad encircling a city or other restricted territory, intersected by other railroads, not having a common right of way into the territory for the purpose of transferring and switching cars from one railroad to another with which it is not otherwise connected, or for transferring cars between such railroads and industrial plants located in the neighborhood of but not on such railroads.[44]

Commercial railroad. A term embracing all railroads for general freight and passenger traffic between one town and another or between one place and another;[45] a railroad properly equipped for the running of passenger trains, freight trains, and doing and conducting a general freight and railway passenger business,[46] one whose general business is not carried on within a city.[47]

Steam railroad. A term used to describe an ordinary commercial railroad, because the latter, which carries both passengers and freight is usually propelled by steam.[48]

Tramroad or tramway. The term "tramroad" has no settled or well-defined meaning,[49] but is applied to railways which are built generally along the surface of the ground, where no particular attention is paid to a uniform grading of the roadbed.[50]

The term "tramway" likewise has no fixed and strict meaning.[51] Although it has been held that a tramway is but an improved road or passway,[52] in the ordinary use of the word it is a railroad or railway over which cars are operated.[53] Nevertheless, it has been said that whether a tramway is a railway in a given case must of necessity depend on the facts of the concrete case, and not on an abstract definition.[54]

Trunk railway. A commercial railway, whose main line, whether operated by steam, electricity, or any other motive power, connects towns, cities, counties, or other points within the state or in different states, and which railroad company, under its charter, or under the general law, has the legal capacity of constructing, purchasing, and operating branch lines or feeders connecting with its main stem or trunk, the main or trunk line bearing the same relation to its branches that the trunk of a tree bears to its branches, or the main stream of a river bears to its tributaries.[55]

(b) Lateral or Branch Railroad or Line

A lateral or branch railroad is one running from some point on the main line, usually as an offshoot of such line, from a point between its termini, and intended as a connecting line or feeder, as distinguished from a cut-off or auxiliary main line; the determination as to what is a branch road does not depend on either its length or direction

While it has been held that the phrase "branch railroad" is of such ambiguous import that its meaning cannot be determined without reference to the circumstances surrounding the parties when they used it,[56] generally a "lateral" or "branch" railroad, the one term being an equivalent of the other,[57] is one running from some point on the main line,[58] usually as an offshoot of such line,[59] from a point between its termini,[60] and intended as a connecting line or feeder,[61] as distinguished from a cut-off or auxiliary main line.[62] The term implies the existence of a main line,[63] to which the branch or lateral road is an appendage and of which it is properly a part,[64] and so, strictly speaking, a disconnected line of railroad is not a branch;[65] and, on the other hand, the term does not include a mere spur track.[66]

The determination as to what is a branch road does not depend on either its length or its direction,[67] and the character of a road as a lateral or branch road is not affected by the fact that it connects with the road of another company,[68] or

(3) Street or Interurban Railroad Distinguished From Other Railroads

Although in some features there is a similarity between a steam or commercial railroad and a street or interurban railroad, the law recognizes a clear distinction between them in view of the difference of the main purposes and functions of the two classes of roads and in the manner of their construction and operation.

While in some features there is a similarity between a steam or commercial railroad and a street railroad, in view of the distinguishing features of the latter and of the difference of the main purposes and functions of the two classes of roads, the law recognizes a clear distinction between them;[71] and, although the words "railroad" and "street railroad" have, at present, a significance somewhat different from that which they had in the early development of these different classes of railroads, the general character of each is still distinguishable.[72]

The term "railroad" or "railway" is a generic term, as discussed supra subdivision a (2) (a) of this section, and is broad enough to include a street railroad,[73] and may, of course, be used as to mean a street railway,[74] but in ordinary popular usage a commercial railroad is understood to be referred to by the term "railroad" or "railway," unless it is qualified by the word "street" or other expression of similar import.[75] The distinction between a street railroad and an ordinary commercial railroad is not alone in the motive power used,[76] but is in the manner of construction and operation.[77] It has been held that the distinctive and essential feature of a street railroad, considered in relation to other railroads, is that it is a railroad for the transportation of passengers and not of freight,[78] but in view of the recent development of street railroads there is now no such inherent distinction.[79]

As used in constitutional and statutory provisions relating to railroads, where there is doubt as to the true meaning of the term "railroad" or "railway," the legislative intent is to be determined from the circumstances and the whole body of the legislation bearing on the question,[80] and as so construed may or may not include a street railroad according to the purpose and intention of the particular statute or ordinance.[81] Some courts emphasize the similarity between the two kinds of railroad, and the word "railroad" as used in a statute includes a street railroad unless there appears from the title of the act, its purpose, or context something to indicate the contrary.[82] Other courts emphasize the dissimilarity and hold that the term "railroad" or "railway" without qualification does not include a street railroad[83] unless the intention to do so is apparent from the general legislation on the subject or the context of the particular statute.[84]

Elevated railroad. It has been held that an elevated railroad is included in the term "railroad corporation" as used in a general railroad act.[85]

Interurban railroad. While an interurban railroad has in some respects the characteristics of an ordinary commercial railroad,[86] and may sometimes be considered as included within the term "railroad,"[87] it is recognized as a distinct and separate class of railroad as distinguished from a commercial or steam railroad.[88]

b. Railroad or Railway Company or Corporation

A railroad company or railroad corporation is a company which is engaged in operating a railroad, whether or not it owns rolling stock or the track over which it operates; and accordingly, whether a particular company is to be regarded as a railroad company depends principally on whether or not it is engaged in the railroad business, and not on the name of the company, or the primary purpose for which, if a corporation, it was incorporated.

While "railroad company" or "railroad corporation" has been defined as a corporation, company, or individual who lays out, constructs, maintains, or operates a railroad,[89] it is, more specifically, a company which is engaged in operating a railroad,[90] for it is not essential to the idea of a railroad company that it should both construct and operate a railroad,[91] and a mere construction company, although authorized to construct a railroad, is not a railroad company.[92] However, a corporation engaged as a carrier in transportation by rail,[93] or a terminal company operating tracks and facilities to be used by other roads,[94] is a railroad company, whether or not it owns rolling stock[95] or the track over which it operates.[96]

The question whether a particular company is to be regarded as a railroad company or within the application of statutes relating in terms to such companies depends principally on whether or not it is engaging in the railroad business,[97] and not on the name of the company,[98] or the primary purpose for which, if a corporation, it was incorporated,[99] or the right or title by which the property is held;[1] and, as used in a statute relating to taxation, the terms "railroad company" and "railroad corporation" should be construed as designating the character of the property rather than of its ownership.[2] Neither term necessarily imports a corporation,[3] and both ordinarily include natural persons engaged in the operation of a railroad;[4] but it has been held that, unless the contrary appears, a railroad company will be presumed to be a corporation.[5]

As including receivers, mortgagees, or trustees. Statutes applicable in terms to railroad companies have been held to apply to a receiver operating a railroad,[6] a mortgagee or trustee under a mortgage in possession,[7] and a trust company operating a road for the benefit of stockholders.[8]

Company organized for other purposes. A company authorized to operate a railroad for the transportation of persons and property is none the less a railroad company because it is also authorized to conduct some other business, as that of a bridge, mining, or manufacturing company;[9] and even though organized primarily for some other purpose, if it is also authorized to, and does, operate a railroad, not only for the transportation of its own product, but as a public railway for the conveyance of freight or passengers, it is a railroad company,[10] whether or not it is in fact doing any public business.[11] However, a company organized to carry on another business, which operates a tramroad or railroad merely in connection with, and for the purposes of, its own business, and not as a transportation business for the public generally, ordinarily is not properly designated a "railroad company" or included within the term,[12] although in some cases it has been held to be such;[13] nor is a union depot company a railroad company.[14]

Distinguished from "railroad." While the term "railroad" may sometimes be used to mean "railroad company," as discussed supra subdivision a (1) of this section, properly speaking, there is a clear distinction between the terms, the latter applying to the agency which may construct or own, and the former to the thing constructed or owned,[15] and either may exist without the other.[16]

Railway company. The terms "railroad company" and "railway company" are interchangeable[17] and synonymous.[18]

"Street railway company" compared and distinguished. A street railway company is a kind of railroad company;[19] and the term "railroad corporation" as used in a statute may include a street railway corporation;[20] but it has also been held that there is a distinction between a street railroad company and a commercial railroad company.[21]

c. Brake; Emergency or Service Stop

The term "brakes" refers to all the mechanism employed to stop or retard the motion of a train. An emergency stop is the full application of all the brake power, with the effect of locking the wheels, while a service stop is the gradual checking of the train, without locking of the wheels.

As applied to railroads, the term "brakes" includes all the mechanism which is used to stop or retard the motion of a train.[22]

Dead man's control. A part of the emergency air brake system consisting of a pedal which the engineer must keep fully and continuously depressed in order to keep the train running; any slight lessening of the pressure of the foot on the pedal causes the opening of an attending valve and the complete engaging of the brakes.[23] The term "dead man's control" is derived from the fact that when the operator dies while on duty, or otherwise becomes seriously incapacitated, a quick stop results when his foot releases the pedal.[24]

Emergency brake. A term applied to the operation of the air brake to make an emergency stop; it consists in a full application of all the brake power available which has the effect of locking the wheels, and is used only for a sudden stop in case of danger.[25]

Service brake. In the operation of railroad trains, if the service brake is applied it will stop the train gradually, without locking the wheels.[26]

Emergency stop. A stop made by means of the full application of all the brake power, with the effect of locking the wheels.[27]

Service stop. The checking of a train gradually, without locking the wheels,[28] a stopping used in ordinary cases, where the stop can be accomplished by a gradual application of the brakes.[29]

d. Bridge, Crossing, Cut, and Junction

A railroad bridge is a viaduct constructed for the exclusive use of railroad transportation. A railroad crossing is the crossing of a railroad track. A railroad cut comprises as well the sloping sides as the deepest part of the excavation. A junction is the point or locality where two or more lines of railway meet.

A railroad bridge is a viaduct constructed for the exclusive use of railroad transportation.[30] "Low bridge" in railroad parlance, is a term used to designate a bridge so low as to prevent those engaged upon box cars in the freight service from passing under it in a standing position.[31]

Crossing. A railroad crossing is the crossing of a railroad track;[32] an intersection of railway tracks;[33] the crossing by a railroad of a public highway.[34]

A farm crossing is a crossing constructed for the use of proprietors of lands adjoining the railroad;[35] a crossing used in connection with a farm.[36]

A private crossing, with respect to a railroad crossing, is a crossing neither required nor used for any public purpose.[37] The fact that a private crossing over railroad tracks is used by the public as a means of ingress to, and egress from, the property of the owners of part of the dominant estate used for commercial purposes does not make it a public crossing in a legal sense.[38]

Cut. "Railroad cut" is a term said to have a certain and definite meaning and to comprise as well the sloping sides as the deepest part of the excavation.[39]

"Deep cut" in railroad parlance is a relative term which means such a cut in its entirety as may be reasonably necessary to enable a railroad to use for track purposes the entire width of its right of way.[40]

Junction In the ordinary acceptation as applied to railroads, the term "junction" is frequently employed to designate the point or locality where two or more lines of railway meet.[41]

e. Car or Carriage

(1) In general
(2) Particular kinds

(1) In General

"Car," "railroad car," and "carriage" are words generally employed to designate the vehicles used on railroads, and they refer to a vehicle adapted to the rails of a railroad or a vehicle running upon rails.

"Car," as used in railroad terminology, is the word generally employed to designate the vehicles used on railroads.[42] So the word has been defined or employed as meaning a vehicle running on rails;[43] a vehicle adapted to the rails of a railroad;[44] a carriage for running on the rails of a railway;[45] any wheeled carriage used for carrying goods or passengers on a railroad, whether the road is a tramway over the streets of a city, to be operated by horses, or a more extended road to be worked by steam tractors.[46]

The word "car" is sometimes used in its generic sense to embrace locomotive engines[47] and all kinds of railroad cars.[48] The word does not, however, always include locomotives,[49] and, where the context makes a distinction between cars and locomotives used as the motive power for a train of cars, the term has been held to exclude engines, helper engines, and pusher engines where they constitute part of the motive power of the train,[50] but to include a dead engine coupled into a train to be hauled.[51] The word has been held both to include and to exclude a locomotive tender, the tender being governed by the classification accorded the locomotive of which it is a part.[52] Other special types of cars held to be embraced by the term are hand cars,[53] passenger cars,[54] push cars,[55] and shovel cars.[56]

Carriage. It has been held that the word "carriage" embraces railroad cars.[57]

Railroad car. A vehicle adapted to the rails of a railroad;[58] a vehicle running upon rails[59] The term, in its general sense, has been held to include a freight car[60] and a hand car;[61] but the term as used in some statutes does not include electric railway passenger coaches[62]

(2) Particular Kinds

A qualifying term is usually added to the word "car" to indicate the particular use or style, such as, freight car, box car, platform car, etc. Terms referring to other particular kinds of cars have also been defined.

While the word "car" is the general term employed for the designation of vehicles used on railroads, a qualifying term is usually added to indicate the particular use or style, such as freight car, box car, platform car, dining car, parlor car, smoking car, etc.[63]

Blind car. A term applied to railroad mail and baggage cars, meaning that there is neither step nor platform at the ends of these cars[64]

Box car. An inclosed and covered freight car;[65] a roofed freight car with inclosed sides.[66]

Caboose or caboose car. "Caboose" is a word used interchangeably with "caboose car;"[67] a car attached to the rear of a freight train, fitted up for the accommodation of the conductor, brakeman, and chance passengers;[68] a car used on freight or construction trains for workmen or train crew;[69] a car for the accommodation of the men connected with the train.[70]

A "bobtailed caboose" is one with a door in the front end without any platform.[71]

attached caboose.[72]

A "dinkey caboose" is a shorter and lighter caboose with steps built on an iron frame attached to the side of the car, like the steps of a ladder.[73]

Coal car. A flat car with a coal bin on top of it.[74]

Combination car. A railroad car with a door in each side and each end, and with a platform at the end next to the locomotive, but none at the other end.[75]

Company fuel car. A car belonging to a railroad company and used by it when necessary for the movement of coal from the mines on its own line, and which coal had been bought by the carrier and used solely for its own fuel purposes.[76]

Doser. A flat car equipped with wings, constructed of steel and wood, which can be raised and lowered for the purpose of improving the railway roadbed close to the ends of the ties.[77]

Foreign railway fuel car. A car owned by another railroad company, and which has been by it delivered to the carrier on whose line mines are situated, for the purpose of enabling the car to be loaded with coal and returned to the company by whom the car has been furnished, the coal being intended for use as fuel by such foreign railroad company.[78]

Freight car. A railroad car adapted to the transportation from one point to another of movable articles of every kind, character, and description;[79] a railroad car for carrying freight commonly called a "box car."[80] It may include any car used in the movement of freight,[81] whether freight is actually stored in it[82] or it is used for the purpose of moving the train.[83] It may include a box car, at least temporarily while carrying freight,[84] and also an express car,[85] although every railroad freight car is not an express car.[86] "Freight car" has been distinguished from "refrigerator car."[87]

Gon or Gondola car. In railroad parlance, a gondola car is referred to as a "gon."[88]

Hand car. A car constructed and used for running on the lines of rails of a railroad, being propelled by hand by those riding on it, through the aid of cranks and gearing;[89] a car, equipped with mechanical apparatus for its propulsion, in general use for the purpose of conveying laborers and others, often for considerable distances along the tracks of steam railroad companies.[90] It has been distinguished from "push car."[91]

Lever car. A car propelled by hand on the track of a railway.[92]

Pile driver car. A flat car on which is built a pile driver and an engine, which propels the car forward and backward with its own power by means of sprocket chains and wheels.[93]

Pool car. A car carrying less than carload shipments of several parties, which are "pooled" together in the same car for freight purposes.[94]

Private car. In railroad terminology, a car not of railway ownership.[95] In a particular connection, it may signify a car owned either by a coal mining company or shipper or consumer, and used for the benefit of its owner in conveying coal from the mine to a designated point of delivery.[96]

Push car. A car pushed by railroad laborers by hand along the track from place to place where they might be working.[97] It is a car in the broadest sense of the word, yet with characteristics peculiarly its own, being without any mechanical apparatus for its propulsion and primarily intended to convey tools and kindred paraphernalia used by workmen, yet not intended to be used for the conveying of the workmen themselves[98] It has been distinguished from "street railway car"[99]

Rail car. A railroad car.[1]

Refrigerator car; "reefer." A car built for the purpose of carrying freight and provided with appliances for using ice in order to preserve its contents[2] In railroad parlance, a refrigerator car is referred to as a "reefer."[3]

System car. A car owned by the carrier and in use for the transportation of coal[4]

f. Depot and Freight House

The term "depot" may mean one thing or another, under different circumstances, but ordinarily it means a station or place where railroad trains regularly come to a stop for the convenience of passengers and for the purpose of receiving and discharging freight. The term "depot grounds" means the place and grounds necessary and useful for the loading and unloading of passengers and freight. A "freight house" is a depot where freight is received and temporarily stored.

The term "depot" has been frequently defined,[6] and it may mean one thing or another, under different circumstances.[7] The word has been said to be synonymous with "station"[8] While it may[9] or may not[10] correctly be used to designate a station at which trains merely stop, as for wood and water, more specifically it means a station at which trains stop for the transaction of the ordinary business of the company, the receiving and delivering of freight and passengers;[11] a place where railroad trains regularly come to a stop[12] for the convenience of passengers and for the purpose of receiving and discharging freight;[13] the place where a carrier is accustomed to receive, deposit, and keep ready for transportation or delivery the merchandise carried by it;[14] a certain place situate alongside of or near its railroad, fitted up by it with suitable buildings, erections, appliances, and conveniences for carrying on generally and continuously, in an orderly manner, the business of transporting freights, as is usually done by such companies.[15] The maintenance of either a depot building or an agent is not indispensable to a depot;[16] it depends more on the business done and the matters incidental thereto.[17]

Buildings, etc. The term "depot" usually includes, not only the idea of a stopping place for trains, but also that of a building, or something of the kind, for the protection and convenience of passengers and freight.[18] Such buildings and other things necessary for a regular depot or station may be greater or smaller in number and extent, or more or less elaborate, than others of like kind and for like purposes;[19] but whether they are sufficient, or good, or indifferent, or are intended for, and well or ill adapted to, the purpose of prosecuting the business of transporting freights and passengers, receiving from shippers generally and at all seasonable times such freights as the railroad company is required to transport over its road, such depots imply ordinarily such suitable and sufficient buildings, erections, and appliances as may be necessary in receiving and delivering freights, and for their temporary protection until they shall be transported or delivered to the persons entitled to have them, and that the company has a business office there, and suitable agents and employees to receive and deliver freights, to give receipts, bills of lading for them, and to do like and similar service.[20] They are settled recognized places to which shippers of freights may, at all appropriate times, go to ship or receive them.[21]

In its broadest sense, the word "depot" will include not only the depot building, but the platforms and grounds connected therewith and used by the company for its business purposes with the public at the depot and station,[22] not merely the station house built for the accommodation of passengers, but the grounds prepared and used as depot grounds for the benefit of persons traveling upon the particular railroad, and used by the company, at such point, in operating it as a common carrier;[23] the entire grounds used by the company for its business purposes with the public at that station.[24]

Passenger depot. A depot building used for the reception of passengers.[25] The term as used in some statutes refers not merely to a station house built for the accommodation of passengers, but the grounds prepared and used as depot grounds,[26] including passageways, walkways, or platforms prepared for passengers in boarding and leaving trains,[27] but under other statutes the term is limited so as to include only the whole of the building so used as a depot.[28]

Depot grounds. "Depot grounds" is not only a comprehensive, but is also a flexible, term.[29] Generally it means the place where passengers get on and off trains, and where goods are loaded and unloaded, and all grounds necessary and convenient and actually used for such purposes by the public

A contract to establish a "depot" on certain land is not complied with by constructing a sidetrack and placing a box car where freight may be received and cars stopped when flagged, the term "depot" implying a permanent structure to be used as a receptacle for freight and passengers and to be of the kind usually erected at similar stations along the same railroad.—Missouri Pac. g. Employees of Railroad

A "railroad employee" is a person employed to work on and about a railroad; one whose employer operates a railroad. Terms referring to particular employees or employees having particular duties have also been defined.

A "railroad employee" is a person employed to work on and about a railroad,[37] one whose employer operates a railroad.[38]

Back shop workers. Railroad workers whose jobs have to do with instrumentalities in the repair of railroad equipment completely withdrawn from service.[39]

Brakeman The man whose business it is to manage the brake on railways.[40] The term has been distinguished from "conductor,"[41] and has been distinguished from, and compared with, "extra conductor."[42] An "extra brakeman" is one who has no regular employment, but takes the place of a regular employee when off duty.[43]

A "rear brakeman" is a brakeman posted at or near the rear of the train.[44]

Conductor. Generally speaking, a conductor of a railroad train is the manager of the train,[45] or, as otherwise expressed, the man in charge of the train.[46] He is the superior in authority and grade in every train crew, who has charge of the train and its operations; and all the other members of the crew are under his control and subject to his orders.[47]

Wiper. A wiper is a railroad employee whose duty, as the name imports, is to take care of the locomotive engines when housed between trips, to wipe the machinery, bank the fires, and keep the necessary supply of water in the boilers, so that the engines may be ready for immediate service when required.[73] He is sometimes called a "hostler."[74]

h. Engine House, Shop, and Yard

An "engine house" or "roundhouse" is a place where locomotive engines are kept "Railroad shop" is a term referring to shop buildings and the tracks and grounds set apart for shop purposes. A "railroad yard" is a tract of ground upon which are railroad tracks, used for the purpose of receiving and storing cars when not in use, or used for the purpose of switching, in the distribution of cars and engines to other places, and in the making up of trains.

An "engine house" or "roundhouse," in common parlance, is a place where locomotive engines are kept.[75]

Railroad shop. A term which has been construed as including not only the shop buildings[76] but also all the tracks and grounds set apart for shop purposes.[77]

Railroad yard. A tract of ground upon which are railroad tracks, used for the purpose of receiving and storing cars when not in use, or used for the purpose of switching, in the distribution of cars and engines to other places, and in the making up of trains,[78] or for incidental purposes, as for storage, repairs, equipment, cleaning, furnishing of equipment, etc.,[79] a place for the deposit of cars and the making up of trains,[80] consisting of sidetracks upon either side of the main tracks, and adjacent to some principal station or depot grounds, where cars are placed for deposit, and where arriving trains are separated and departing trains made up,[81] the place where such switching is done as is essential to the proper placing of cars either for deposit or for departure[82]

"Gravity yard" is a term employed where a switch track is constructed on a downgrade for a certain distance, and from thenceforth on a level, so that cars are switched by allowing them to run down by gravity, thereby saving the handling of cars by locomotive.[83]

i. Locomotive, Tender, and Related Terms

The term "locomotive" in its comprehensive sense applies to all self-propelling engines or machines used on railroads for the ordinary purpose of transporting freight or passengers. A "tender" is a small car carrying water and fuel for the engine, to which the first passenger or freight car of the train is usually coupled.

locomotive" is a machine which derives its energy or power from steam produced by coal or oil fire applied to a boiler containing a sufficient quantity of water.[86]

Locomotive engine. A term with a well-known significance;[87] one which moves cars by its own forward and backward motion,[88] a vehicle moved by a steam engine and designed to run over the track of a railroad from place to place.[89] In its common and ordinary meaning "locomotive engine" is one which is operated by steam in drawing or propelling cars.[90]

Dead engine or live engine. A "dead engine" is one without steam, with a part of its machinery disconnected, and which is drawn the same as regular cars;[91] it is distinguished from an engine with steam which is a "live engine."[92]

Dinkey engine. A "dinkey engine" is a locomotive of regular pattern, but small size.[93]

Locomotive steam. Such as is used in a locomotive engine.[94]

Lone engine. A locomotive not hauling any cars except its own tender.[95]

Road engines; yard engines. Engines which regularly run between different points on a railroad line are known as "road engines," in contradistinction to "yard engines," which perform service only in the yards.[96]

Shifting engine. One used to shift cars from one track to another and to and from a yard.[97]

Tender and pit. A "tender" is a small car carrying water and fuel for the engine, to which the first passenger or freight car of the train is usually coupled.[98] The "pit" of a locomotive tender is the part of the tender next to the engine in which the coal for use in the locomotive is stored.[99]

Terms relating to parts of locomotive. The term "blind flue" or its equivalent, "flue pocket," as applied to a locomotive, refers to a short flue which extends into a boiler for about six or eight inches behind the flue sheet, and is closed at the inner end.[1]

"Grates of the engine" is a term which is understood not to mean any part of that particular contrivance by which the steam itself is applied to the wheels, but as one of the component parts which go to make up and complete a machine in position to propel railroad cars by steam.[2]

The term "keyhole," as applied to a locomotive, refers to the crosshead of the locomotive to which the driving rod is connected or fastened by a bolt or pin.[3]

The "pony truck" of an engine consists of the small wheels in front of the drivers; they are at the front of the engine immediately behind the pilot.[4]

"Spark arrester" is a term referring to the spark catcher of a locomotive.[5]

j. Right of Way, Roadbed, Roadway, Substructure, and Superstructure

The "right of way" is the strip of land ordinarily used for the building and maintaining of grades, and the ties and rails thereon constituting the railroad track. The "roadbed" is that part of the right of way especially prepared for the emplacement of ties, rails, and other necessary superstructures, and to which they are affixed. The "roadway" is the right of way. The "substructure" consists of the embankment, cuts, fills, and other things necessary to make up the roadbed. The "superstructure" is the roadbed with whatever has been constructed upon it

The term "right of way" as used in provisions of law relating to railroads means the strip of land ordinarily condemned or acquired by railroad companies for the building and maintaining of grades, and the ties and rails thereon constituting the railroad track[6] The terms "right of way" and "roadbed" have been compared and distinguished.[7]

Roadbed. In railroad parlance "roadbed" is a word of plain import,[8] with a well-understood meaning[9] It has been said that, strictly speaking,[10] and in its restricted sense,[11] the roadbed is the bed or foundation on which the superstructure of the railroad rests.[12] In a less strict sense "roadbed" has been defined as that part of the right of way especially prepared for the emplacement of ties, rails, and other necessary superstructures, and to which the ties, rails, and other necessary superstructures are affixed;[13] the road, including the roadway or right of way, with the roadbed and its superstructure of ties, rails, etc, in place thereon;[14] and accordingly it has been said that the roadbed may include land for sidings and turnouts,[15] snowsheds,[16] and crossing planks,[17] but not the rails and ties,[18] a railroad bridge,[19] a coal and ore terminal,[20] or steamers.[21] From an engineering standpoint, the roadbed includes all that is necessary to support the superstructure.[22] By statute, the roadbed of a railroad may include all side tracks, switches, trestles, bridges, and the ties, rails, fastenings, and superstructure of every kind[23] The term has been compared with, and distinguished from, "railroad," as discussed supra subdivision a (1) of this section, "roadway,"[24] and "superstructure,"[25] and in particular circumstances the term has been held synonymous with "track"[26]

Roadway The right of way[27] According to the ordinary and popular meaning of the word as applied to railroad, it includes simply the continuous strip of land within which the railroad is constructed,[28] whatever space of ground the company is allowed by law in which to construct its roadbed and lay its track[29] "Roadway" has, however, been held to include not only the strip of land upon which the main line is constructed, but all ground necessary for the construction of side tracks, turnouts, connecting tracks, station houses, freight houses, and all other accommodations necessary to accomplish the objects of the incorporation of the railroad[30] It has been held that the term may not include a telegraph line[31] or steamers.[32]

Substructure. The embankment, cuts, fills, and other things necessary to make up the roadbed.[33]

Superstructure. The roadbed with whatever has been constructed upon it.[34] The meaning of the word has been limited to sleepers, rails, and fastenings,[35] in distinction from the roadbed.[36] The rails in place, it has been said, constitute the superstructure resting upon the roadbed.[37]

k. Siding and Turnout

A "siding" is a railroad track by the side of, or branching from, the main track, but connected with the main track at one or both ends, either for switching a train to allow another train to pass or to convey freight or passengers to depots or stations adjacent to the main track. A "turnout" is a short line of track, having connection by means of switches with the main track, which lies parallel to the main track, or nearly so.

In railroad parlance or construction, a "siding" is a railroad track by the side of, or branching from, the main track, but connected with the main track at one or both ends, either for switching a train to allow another train to pass or to convey freight or passengers to depots or stations adjacent to the main track;[38] the turnout of a railroad.[39]

A "blind siding" is a sidetrack where there is no telegraphic station.[40]

Turnout. With respect to railroads, "turnout" is not a technical word,[41] and the law attaches no particular meaning to it;[42] but in common and general use the term is used to designate a short line of track, having connection by means of switches with the main track;[43] a short side track;[44] a short side track designed to enable one train to pass another;[45] a short side track, upon which one train may be shunted to permit another to pass on the main track;[46] a short side track which may be occupied by one train while another is passing on a main track;[47] a siding;[48] a siding, having connection with the main line track, upon which one train may be switched to permit another train to pass on the main-line track;[49] a shunt.[50] One characteristic of a "turnout" is that it lies parallel to the main track, or nearly so.[51] The word relates to tracks in the nature of side tracks adjacent to, and used in connection with, another line of track,[52] and does not refer to a track which branches off entirely from the existing line and extends laterally to a distant objective point, and which can only be properly described as a lateral road.[53] Certain tracks in use night and day, during the busy seasons of shipment, for storing, handling, switching, transferring, and assorting the freight of two yards, connecting one with the other, and simply a narrowing up of the two yards and a part thereof are not "turnouts," as understood by railroad men.[54]

l. Signal and Signal System

A "signal" is the doing of some act whereby notice or warning is given, such as ringing a bell, blowing a whistle, waving a lantern, or shooting a torpedo The "block system" is a system of regulating the running of trains by automatic signals or otherwise, in which the track is divided into sections called blocks, on any one of which, ordinarily, only one train at a time is allowed.

The common understanding of the word "signal" as used in connection with the operation of a railroad is one which implies action; the doing of some act whereby notice or warning is given, such as ringing a bell, blowing a whistle, waving a lantern, or shooting a torpedo.[55]

Highball signal. A term used in railroading to describe a signal directing the engineer on a train to go past a station without stopping.[57]

Kick signal. A signal calling for a quick and sudden movement of the train.[58]

Move slow signal. A signal calling for a slow and gradual movement of the train.[59]

Points. A complicated apparatus for giving or making signals.[60]

Semaphore. A mechanical device for displaying signals, generally used to denote when a railroad track is clear or otherwise.[61]

Block system. A system of regulating the running of trains on a railroad by automatic signals or otherwise, in which the track is divided into sections called blocks, on any one of which, ordinarily, only one train at a time is allowed.[62]

Interlocking signal system. A tower built on or near the point of crossing of two roads, in which are placed wires connected by levers with signals to insure each way on the road, at a distance sufficient to insure the stoppage of a train before it reaches the point of crossing.[63]

m. Station

"Station" in a broad sense means a place at which both freight and passengers are received for transportation or are delivered after transportation, including the yard and the grounds and buildings prepared for, and used by, the traveling public in waiting for, taking, and leaving trains; in a narrower sense it means a building or place prepared for the reception and discharge of passengers and freight.

The word "station," as far as it applies to railroads and their management, has acquired no technically legal meaning,[64] and it is a question of fact as to just what constitutes a station.[65] In a broad sense, it means a place at which both freight and passengers are received for transportation or are delivered after transportation;[66] a place where passengers are received upon, and discharged from, railroad trains,[67] a place on a railroad at which a halt is made for the purpose of taking on, or letting down, passengers or goods;[68] a place where railroad trains regularly come to a stand for the convenience of passengers, taking in freight, etc,[69] every regular stopping place of a railway train, where it receives or leaves passengers.[70] Moreover, the word has been construed to include the yard,[71] the whole track within the limits of the station yard,[72] or as much of the track adjacent to the structure as is commonly used by trains.[73] It may include the place, the grounds, and the buildings prepared for and used by the traveling public in waiting for, taking, and leaving trains.[74] It has been said that a depot building or the presence of a station agent is not indispensable to constitute a station,[75] and in fact the word includes a flag station.[76]

In a narrower sense the word "station" means a building or place prepared for the reception and discharge of passengers and freight.[77] The term is said to be synonymous with "depot," and has been construed to be a synonym of "depot grounds" and "passenger depot," as discussed supra subdivision f of this section.

Blind station. A station where there is no station house or agent, but at which all passenger and freight trains stop when flagged.[78]

Flag station. A railroad station at which trains do not stop unless signaled, as by a flag.[79]

Station grounds. The place where passengers get on or off the train, and where freight is loaded or unloaded, including all grounds reasonably necessary or convenient to that purpose.[80]

n. Switch

"Switch" has been defined as a mechanical contrivance or movable opening to pass cars from one track to another; in its simplest form, two parallel lengths of rails joined together by rods, pivoted at one end, and free to move at the other end, forming a part of the track at its junction with a branch or siding. The word "switch" as a verb means to shift from one track to another.

With respect to railroads, "switch" is a word of modern growth,[81] and has been defined as but a mechanical contrivance or movable opening to pass the cars from one track to another;[82] a mere side track, so constructed as to permit the passage of cars from and to the main track.[83] It is a device for moving a small section of track so that rolling stock may be run or shunted from one line of track to another;[84] a movable part of a track by which the direction of a train is changed from one set of rails to another;[85] in its simplest form, two parallel lengths of rails joined together by rods, pivoted at one end, and free to move at the other end, forming a part of the track at its junction with a branch or siding.[86]

The purpose of a switch is to direct a car from the course which it was formerly pursuing.[87] The term "switch" may, in addition to its technical meaning, have a meaning dependent on facts which indicate its character;[88] thus, in common speech the word is often used as a synonym for "siding"[89]

and "turnout."[90] An approach to a bridge must be regarded as a switch or side track rather than as a branch or lateral railway.[91] "Switch" has been held not to be included within "double tracks" as used in an ordinance.[92] A switch is not a drawbridge[93] nor does the word include a cut-off.[94] A switch is not necessarily a place where freight is received or discharged.[95]

"Switches," it has been said, is a term which may be employed as referring to tracks in the nature of side tracks, adjacent to, and used in connection with, another line of track,[96] but not as referring to a track which branches off entirely from the existing line, and extends laterally to a distant objective point, and which can only be properly described as a lateral road;[97] nor, as understood by railway men, does the word include tracks used exclusively in connection with freight yards, and as to a portion thereof, for the storing of cars, the making up of trains, and the transfer of trains from one yard to the other and from one railroad to another.[98]

As a verb. The word "switch," as a verb, means to shift from one track to another;[99] to shunt;[1] to transfer by a switch;[2] to transfer from one line of rails to another;[3] to turn from one railway track to another.[4] The word applies to cars and parts of trains as well as to entire trains.[5]

"Switching" is a word without technical meaning, common to railroad parlance,[6] applicable to cars and parts of trains as well as to entire trains,[7] and may be used as synonymous with "transferring."[8]

Derail switch. A device which when set will cause a car running loose on the sidetrack to run off its rails to the ground before reaching the main track.[9]

Drop switch. A switching of cars made in operation of railroads by detaching or cutting loose cars from the engine and permitting them to run or roll of their own momentum down an incline.[10]

Flying switch. A running switch;[11] a switch made by attaching to the car to be switched an engine, giving the car a sufficient impetus, and then detaching the engine, running it ahead out of the way, and allowing the car, with the impetus thus imparted, to run to the place desired;[12] a switch operated or effected in such a way, while a train is in motion, as to send different parts of the train, previously connected, along different lines.[13]

Private switch. A switch built for the use of an individual industry carried on at that point, and not to be used for other or general railroad business.[14]

"Split switch." A switch where there is one permanent rail, so that if the switch is open it allows the car or train to run up another track.[15]

o. Terminal

"Terminal" means a station at which trains regularly begin and end their respective runs. "Terminal facilities" are facilities owned by the carrier, equipped with the proper appliances necessary to enable the railroad to perform its full duty of transportation and delivery of freight of all kinds.

The word "terminal" as pertaining to a railroad, means a station at which trains regularly begin and end their respective runs;[20] property used for the purpose of furnishing terminal facilities in the operation of a railroad;[21] the end of a run;[22] the end or terminus of the road;[23] the fixed beginning or ending point of a given run.[24]

It has been held, however, that a "railroad terminal" is not simply the ending of a line, where there is a depot or yard office;[25] such a terminal may be, and is, a general place for the receipt of passengers and freight, and for the making up and classification of trains, the repairing and outfitting of engines or other conveyances, and is generally a combination of a workshop where the trains are prepared for transportation and where the men start their work.[26]

Terminal facilities Facilities owned by the carrier, equipped with the proper appliances necessary to enable the railroad to perform its full duty of transportation and delivery of freight of all kinds;[27] mechanical devices for the exchange, receipt, and distribution of traffic.[28] The term has been held to include docks,[29] freight houses, grain elevators, and warehouses,[30] but not to include tracks other than "make-up" tracks.[31]

Terminal point. The terminus as fixed in a city or town, and not the depot as located within such city or town.[32]

p. Track

A "railroad track," in the ordinary sense, is two continuous lines of rails on which railway cars run, forming, together with the ties, ballast, switches, etc., the permanent way. A "wye" is a track with two legs, one joining the main track from one direction and the other joining the main track from another direction.

Repair track. One upon which cars needing repairs are put, and upon which it is not customary for the shifting engine to come without notice to the overhaulers at work there.[47]

Side track. The term is said to have a well-known signification,[48] and to mean a connection with some railroad affording communication with the market;[49] a short track connected by switches at one or more points with the main track,[50]

a switch track;[51] or the tracks in a yard.[52]

Skeleton track. A term applied to a railroad track in such condition that the spaces between the ties are not filled to the tops of the ties, about one half of the ties being exposed.[53]

Spur track A short branch line of track,[54] leading from a line of railway, and connected with it at one end only;[55] a stub track;[56] a track for use in loading, reloading, storing, and switching the cars and other things merely incidental to the regular train haul;[57] a track which is projected and extended laterally or at an angle to the main line, and is not an adjunct usual or necessary to the primary operation of main line trains and cars.[58] A spur track is primarily a facility for one or several shippers, although open to all others who may be practicably served by it,[59] and it differs from an "extension"[60] in that the latter is for the convenience of the whole public as a part of the principal railroad system.[61]

Team track. A siding on a railroad for loading and unloading cars when freight comes in carload lots;[62] a track on which cars are placed to be loaded or unloaded by wagons, and now more frequently by trucks.[63]

Track delivery. The term "track delivery" as used in a statute referring to place of delivery of freight means tracks maintained by the railroad company at an accessible place for unloading, for the purpose of delivering freight in carload lots.[64]

Wye A term which necessarily means a track with two legs, one joining the main track from one direction and the other joining the main track from another direction;[65] it is also called a "Y;"[66] and it is said to be distinguished from "single track,"[67] as in the phrase "to lay a single track or wye."[68] road. In common language, a train is a conveyance which serves the public in conveying passengers or freight, or both, and which runs upon fixed tracks.[72] As used in certain statutes, the word "train" may signify cars in motion.[73]

As car or cars attached to locomotive. As usually understood, a train is composed of one or more engines, with one or more cars attached for the purpose of being moved to another place,[74] although it has been said that the word denotes and connotes "several" cars coupled together and moved by a locomotive.[75] The word "train" covers any string of cars hauled by an engine.[76] Likewise, a locomotive with one or more cars attached to it, with or without passengers or freight, in motion upon a railroad from one point to another by means of power furnished by the locomotive, would undoubtedly constitute a train.[77] However, under the construction put on certain statutes or railroad rules, the word "train" does not cover every car or string of cars attached to an engine.[78]

As moving without locomotive. Although, as used in certain statutes, "train" may signify cars in motion, and although the power is usually furnished by a locomotive, whether a number of cars, coupled together and in motion, forming one connected whole, do or do not constitute a train does not depend on whether a locomotive engine is attached to them at the time.[79] Accordingly, a number of cars coupled together, forming one connected whole and moving from one point to another upon a railroad, in the ordinary course of its traffic, under an impetus imparted to them by a locomotive which shortly before has been detached, may constitute a train within the meaning of a statute.[80] A number of runaway cars, coupled together, has been held to constitute a train within the meaning of a statute.[81]

As engine, engine and tender, or motor car. Generally, a single engine is not a train.[82] Under certain statutes or railroad rules, however, the word "train" may include an engine, or more than one engine coupled, with or without cars, or a motor car.[83]

Used as an adjective. "Train" is used as an adjective in certain phrases which have received judicial construction.[84]

(2) Particular Kinds

The particular character of a train is designated by a word preceding the word "train," such as "freight train," "passenger train," etc., and such particular kinds of trains have been specifically defined.

The word "train" is used with respect to railroad traffic to mean all kinds of trains, the character of the train being designated by a word, such as "freight train," "passenger train," "mail train," and "construction train."[85]

Accommodation train. A train running at moderate speed, and stopping at all or nearly all stations.[86]

Extra or wild train; wildcat train. A train which is not classified on the time-tables, and is required to keep entirely out of the way of all regular trains of whatever class.[87] So a "wild train" has been variously defined as a train consisting of a locomotive, tender, and caboose car on which no persons except the servants of the railroad company are permitted to ride;[88] a train not running by schedule, but under special instructions,[89] a train running under telegraphic orders, but without any schedule or time card.[90] Similarly, a "wildcat train" is an unscheduled train;[91] an occasional train moving without prearrangement, but by special order without reference to any schedule or the regular trains, and conforming to no conditions save the immediate order of the owner.[92]

Freight train. A term having a well-defined meaning;[93] a train primarily for the carriage of freight;[94] a train used for transporting commodities or matter of any kind.[95]

Local train In railroad parlance, a train which stops at all stations and does not run with great rapidity when in motion.[96]

Mixed train. A train equipped and having the appliances and facilities suited for the carriage of passengers as well as freight.[97]

Passenger train. A term with a well defined meaning.[98] Ordinarily it signifies a train advertised to take passengers generally, people traveling from place to place, on the terms and in the manner ordinarily applicable to such passengers;[99] in ordinary parlance, one which carries passengers, their baggage, mail, and express only.[1] The term "regular passenger train" has sometimes been used,[2] and it has been held that the difference in the significance of "passenger train" and "regular passenger train" is that the former term includes all passenger trains, regular and irregular, not only trains which move every day on schedule time, whereas the term "regular passenger train" means a passenger train on the regular schedule list.[3] While accommodation freight trains are not passenger trains in the ordinary sense of the term,[4] and the carrying of passengers in a caboose attached to a freight train does not change the freight train into a passenger train,[5] the term "passenger train" need not be applied only to a train devoted exclusively to the transportation of passengers.[6] A train is still a passenger train if it has all the facilities and conveniences for passengers which the law requires, even though the carrier may transport at the same time and on the same train shipments of freight.[7]

Revenue train. A train is a revenue train when

r. Other terms

Numerous particular words or terms relating to railroads have been defined, including box step, cap, car mover, cellar, cinder pit, creeping, crosstie, dead blocks, and derailer.

In addition to the railroad terms defined supra subdivisions a–q of this section, other particular words or terms have been defined by the courts.[10] Phrases employing the word "railroad" or "railway" as to which more recent adjudications have not been found, see 51 C.J. p 372 note 51–p 373 note 85.

Box step. On railroad passenger cars, a platform step; a tread in a ledge consisting of risers and treads; distinguished from "sill step."[11]

Cap. A term used in railroad trestle construction, referring to a timber placed on top of each row of piles, on which stringers are laid, extending from one cross row of piles to the next.[12]

Car mover. A metal device with a wooden handle designed to move a railroad car by exertion of pressure against the wheel, manually operated by working the handle up and down.[13]

Cattle gap, cattle guard, or cattle pass; farm crossing. The terms "cattle guard," "cattle pass," and "farm crossing" have significance in connection with the construction of a railroad which has divided a farm in such a manner as to expose the stock of the owner to the danger of passing trains, to deprive him of access to some part of his pasture or some part of his tillage land; each of these terms, separately analyzed, has a distinct and limited application.[14]

A railroad "cattle gap" or "cattle guard" may be defined as a contrivance to restrain cattle.[15] The term "cattle guard" signifies some kind of a device alongside a railroad crossing to keep cattle off the track.[16] It is also defined as an appliance to prevent animals from escaping from inclosures in which they are confined over the railroad track and going upon land of others adjoining the right of way.[17]

A "cattle pass" is a narrow passageway under a railroad track, wide enough and high enough to admit the passage of a cow, horse, or ox to and from a pasture.[18]

Cellar. A receptacle on a truck of a railroad car or engine placed underneath the bearing of the axle for the purpose of keeping the bearing properly oiled while in motion.[20]

Cinder pit. A pit in a roundhouse extending the full width under a railroad track over which engines are "spotted" for the purpose of having fire boxes cleaned and cinders raked out;[21] an excavation beneath the rails, about three and a half feet deep, and walled up, into which the cinders are dropped, and from thence removed;[22] a depression beneath the track, deepest in the center and gradually decreasing to nothing at either end, where the engine wiper or "cinder pit man" gets under the engine to clean it of clinkers and cinders.[23]

of connecting the uncoupling lever and chain, so that uncoupling may be done without the necessity of men going between the ends of the cars.[24]

Creeping A technical term applied to steam locomotives, described as an unexpected movement of the engine, forward or in reverse, caused by temporary conditions affecting the apparatus which show their presence only in their untoward results,[25] and defined as a movement of the reversing mechanism as well as the valve gear without the operating lever in the cab having been adjusted, which causes an undesired change in the point at which the admission of steam into the cylinders is cut off.[26]

Crosstie. A sleeper, connecting and supporting the parallel rails of a railroad.[27]

Dead blocks. Bumpers placed on railway cars, to receive the concussion and the shock when moving cars come in contact with stationary cars.[28] They are constructed on the frame of the car above the drawheads, which are below, and attached to the trucks.[29]

Deadwood. A wooden block, part of the coupling attachment, fastened to the end of a railroad car;[30] the fixture or part of the car which comes in contact with the gooseneck of the tender when coupling is done.[31]

"Double deadwoods" is a term applied to the buffers on a railroad car.[32]

Derailer. A heavy metal safety device placed near the rail and controlled by lever to enable it to be pulled close against the rail, so that, when so placed, the inclined groove and flange on the derailer will serve to guide a car wheel onto and across the top of the rail, and derail the car.[33]

Division point A place where the officials of a division are permanently located or a place where trains are regularly made up and terminate their runs, and train crews are regularly changed.[34]

Double cut. The operation whereby an engine upon the lead track moves back with such force that the momentum of uncoupled cars, when the train is slackened, is sufficient to carry such cars upon the switch track.[35]

Double header. A term meaning a train drawn by two engines or locomotives.[36]

Drag A term applied to a number of freight cars, usually loaded, being transferred from one railroad yard to another.[37]

Drawbar. The part of a single deadwood which receives the concussion when railroad cars are coupled.[38]

Drifting. An expressive phrase applied to freight cars not billed to any destination, meaning available for any use,[39] waiting to be assigned for service.[40]

Dummy line. A railroad operated with trains pulled by small engines called "dummy engines."[41]

Dutchman. In the vernacular of railroad employees, a spliced rail is called a "dutchman."[42]

Dynamiting. In railroad parlance, "dynamiting" a train signifies using the means provided for emergency stops.[43]

Feather rails. The term is applied to the rails of a short detached movable railway track made to fit over and connect with the regular track.[44]

Flying drill. In railroad parlance, it is accomplished by uncoupling a car from a locomotive from which it has acquired its momentum and turning the switch after the locomotive has passed over it, but before the car has reached it, thereby diverting the car alone on to the switch track.[45]

Frog. A device, now usually made of several rail sections secured to a plate or bolted together through distance pieces, forming a connection of one track with another branching from or crossing it;[46] a section of a rail, or of several rails combined, at a point where two railways cross, or at the point of a switch from a line to a siding or to another line, and its function is to enable a car or train to be turned from one track to another[47]

General offices. As applied to a railroad company, the main offices used for the purpose of operating a railroad[48]

Gooseneck. Used in connection with "deadwood," a term which designates the fixtures or parts of the respective cars which come in contact when coupling is done.[49]

Grab iron. A round iron, three or four feet long, placed immediately over the door of the cupola of a caboose, and used by employees to protect them from injury through jars of the car.[50]

Handhold. A term sometimes used to describe an iron rod intended to assist railroad employees in riding on the footboard of the engine[51] or to assist them in getting on and off a car[52]

Headchair. A part of a block switch, a device used in railroading by which the footings of the ends of the two stationary rails are covered[53]

Hopper bottoms. As applied to railroad gravel cars, bottoms which open out, so that the contents of the car may be emptied on the track.[54]

In the hole. Where more extensive repairs are needed for a locomotive in a roundhouse than those of a minor nature not requiring more than twenty four hours to perform, the locomotive is deemed "in the hole."[55]

Janney coupler. A coupler of the Janney type[56]

Jerking. As applied to a railroad car, a term which means giving it a jerk with the engine and letting it run without the engine being attached to it.[57]

Kick. In railroad parlance, the operation of placing a car on a siding[58]

Knuckle or Knuckles. A part of the coupling on a car.[59] Railroad couplings, resembling two human hands or fists, with fingers clasped into each other, there being a coupling pin, which has to be pulled out before they will lock, are called "knuckles"[60]

Landing. The platform of a railway station.[61]

Lap position. The term refers to a certain position of the brake handle in the railway automatic quick action brake system.[62]

Light or Running light An expression used with respect to a railroad engine when it is not drawing cars.[63]

Lineup. A list of movements scheduled over a railroad track for the day[64]

Lost motion. As applied to a locomotive, a jarring or swinging motion, caused by its worn-out condition[65]

Made up. A term applied to a railroad train when the cars are coupled together, and the train is completed, ready to start out on a trip over the road.[66]

Mail crane; mail catcher. A mail crane is an upright post planted close to the railroad track, with an arm, which, when not in use, hangs by the side of the post, but when in use is extended horizontally toward the track, and from which a suspended mail sack may be taken while the train is in motion by means of an iron hook or "mail catcher" attached to the door of the car, and operated by a mail clerk.[67]

Markers. Side lights on a caboose, showing green in front and red behind, utilized by the engineer and front brakeman for the purpose of readily discovering the train if it parts at night.[68]

Permanent way. A railroad term meaning a finished roadbed and track, including switches, crossings, bridges, viaducts, etc.[69]

Pickup. The movement by which cars are added to a train en route for delivery at another station.[70]

Pilot. A term in railway usage, applied to a person assigned to a train when the engineman or conductor, or both, are not fully acquainted with the physical characteristics, or running rules of the road or portions of the road, over which the train is to be moved,[71] also, the cowcatcher of an engine.[72]

Pinching. An operation whereby the end of a crowbar is placed on the iron rail under the wheel of the car and it is prized along until the car has acquired sufficient momentum to take it down a slight grade.[73]

Platform end sill. On passenger cars, the transverse end piece of the platform frame; also called the "end timber" and "buffer beam" on passenger equipment cars.[74]

Platform step. A part of the stairs at each end of a passenger coach or caboose car which affords the means of ingress or egress.[75] It is sometimes known as a "box step."[76]

Plug. In railroad terminology, to remove enough of the contents of a freight car to reveal the character of the remainder.[77]

Poling. An operation accomplished by adjusting a heavy piece of timber, called a "pole," with one end on and against the front of the engine and the other against the car to be moved, then starting the engine forward, thereby pushing the car by the pole to a point that will allow it to be passed by the engine.[78]

Pushing. In railroad parlance, that method of locomotion where the engine follows the car.[79]

transversely by the end sills, bolsters, and crossties[3]

A "sill step" is a U-shaped iron attached to the sill of a car as a step for trainmen,[4] a strip of iron in the nature of a stirrup.[5]

Snapshot In railroad parlance, it is a condition of the air brakes which causes the brakes to go into emergency, when they are put on for an ordinary stop;[6] also called an "undesired emergency"[7] It is said to be caused by a defective air brake.[8]

Spot, spotting a car. In railroad parlance, the practice of hauling cars to points along the spur convenient to shipper or consignee is known as "spotting."[9]

"Spotting a car" means placing a car either to be loaded or unloaded.[10]

Spout hook. A railroad appliance used in drawing the arm from the standpipe over to the manhole in the tank when an engine is taking water.[11]

Staking cars. A railroad operation whereby a stake attached to an engine or tender, on one track, extending diagonally across to a car on another, is used to shove the car along by the moving engine.[12]

Sun kink. A creeping together of the rails of a railroad track.[13]

Tie up. A railroad phrase meaning to cease to work.[14]

Turn-over The number of cars in a given zone[15]

Walk. To move, used in describing the movement of an engine, without any action by the operatives, after it has been brought to a stop.[16]

§ 2. Nature and Status of Railroad

The purpose of a railroad is the transportation of persons and property for the general public. It is the private and exclusive property of the company by which it is owned.

The purpose of a railroad is the transportation of persons and property for the general public,[17] and as to such purpose railroads have in some cases been termed "public roads" or "highways," whether they have been constructed by the government itself or by the agency of corporations or individuals under legislative authority, as discussed in Highways § 1. A railroad is, however, the private and exclusive property of the company by which it is owned,[18] and it is not a thoroughfare which may be used by pedestrians[19] or on which the public may use its own vehicles, cars, or motive power as on a turnpike or canal,[20] although this seems to have been the early conception of the character of railroads.[21]

§ 3. Nature and Status of Railroad Company

Side sills, intermediate sills, and center sills

Sills are divided into side sills, intermediate sills, and center sills. The end sill is the transverse member of the under frame of a car framed across the ends of all the longitudinal sills. In passenger cars the end sill comes directly under the end door; the platform with its various parts usually being a separate construction. The platform end sill is the transverse end piece of the platform frame, and is also called the "end timber" and buffer beam on passenger equipment cars. —Hill v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. corporation, it is in a class by itself, being neither a strictly private nor a strictly public corporation, but possessing some of the characteristics of both

A railroad company is a public utility,[22] created for the purpose of exercising the functions and performing the duties of a common carrier;[23] and its usual and customary business is the receipt of freight and passengers at various points on its road for transportation to, and delivery at, other points thereon, the issuance of bills of lading, the sale of tickets, and the keeping of books and accounts relative to such business transactions.[24]

Considered as corporation, a railroad company has been said to be in a class by itself,[25] as being neither a strictly private nor a strictly public corporation,[26] but possessing some of the characteristics of both.[27] While it is, technically speaking, a private corporation, as distinguished from municipal or other strictly public corporations,[28] it is essentially different from strictly private corporations,[29] and, owing to the character of its functions, the powers with which it is invested, and the duties which it owes to the public, it is frequently termed a "quasi-public corporation[30] or agency."[31]

§ 4. Right to Engage in Railroad Business

The state itself may construct and operate a railroad unless prohibited by the constitution, or it may authorize others so to do; but the right to engage in the business of maintaining and operating a railroad for the public generally is a franchise which can be exercised only by legislative authority. A franchise to construct and operate a railroad, when granted, is property, and cannot be revoked or taken away unless power to do so is reserved, except in the proper exercise of the police power or the power of eminent domain.

Because of the public nature of a railroad, the state itself may construct and operate it,[32] unless prohibited by the constitution,[33] or it may authorize others so to do.[34] On the other hand, the right to engage in the business of maintaining and operating a railroad for the public generally is a franchise[35] which can be exercised only by legislative authority,[36] and, unless it has been given, even the owner of private property cannot authorize the State or municipality

State Tax Commission, 35 N.Y.S.2d 77, 264 App. Div. 80, modified on other grounds 54 N.E.2d 332, 292 N.Y. 130, motion denied 56 N.E.2d 122, 292 N.Y. 717.

Reasonable restrictions
Franchise granted by the legislature to railway company or its predecessor to operate railroad in the state was subject to such reasonable restrictions in the interest of public safety as the state might undertake to impose.—In re New York, O. & W. Ry. Co., D.C.N.Y., 59 F.Supp. 865.

operation of such a railroad on or across it.[37] A railroad company cannot delegate the exercise of its franchise to others not authorized by law to carry on the transportation business.[38]

While it has been said to be common knowledge that practically all railroads are now operated through the agency of corporations,[39] they need not necessarily be so operated but the right may be conferred on natural persons[40] or unincorporated associations of individuals;[41] but the incorporation of a railroad company, with power to construct and operate a railroad, necessarily involves the grant of a franchise to engage in the railroad business.[42] A grant of such right is not in contravention of a constitutional provision prohibiting the abridgment of the police power.[43] The right of a railroad to construct and maintain its line of railway over its right of way in accordance with the requirements of its business is subject to the restriction that it be used in such manner as not to impose unnecessary burdens on its neighbors.[44]

Right as property. A franchise to construct and operate a railroad, when granted, is property,[45] and cannot be revoked or taken away unless power so to do is reserved,[46] except in the proper exercise of the police power[47] or the power of eminent domain.[48]

Forfeiture. Notwithstanding it is property, the right or franchise to engage in the railroad business is subject to defeasance or forfeiture by failure to exercise it,[49] or by abandonment after it has been exercised,[50] and a railroad company, on forfeiting its corporate franchise, also forfeits its right to engage in the railroad business.[51] The question whether or not the franchise has been forfeited can be determined, however, only in a direct proceeding by the state,[52] except where, under the constitution or a statute, or the charter of the company, particular acts or omissions ipso facto work a forfeiture of the right.[53]

Enjoining unauthorized construction The unauthorized construction of a railroad may be enjoined by a company having a legal right to construct a railroad on the same location,[54] or by another railroad company or property owner who will be injured thereby.[55]

§ 5. —— Exclusive and Conflicting Franchises

A legislative grant of a franchise to engage in the railroad business within a certain territory or between certain places may be exclusive, in which case the rights and privileges granted may not be impaired by subsequent grants; but, where the franchise is nonexclusive, the same or a similar franchise may subsequently be granted to another company, even though the latter grant impairs the value of the former.

A legislative grant of a franchise to engage in the railroad business within a certain territory or between certain places may be exclusive,[56] either for all time,[57] or for a limited period.[58] When an exclusive franchise has been granted, the legislature cannot impair the obligation of the contract involved therein by granting the same or a similar franchise to another company;[59] nor can it grant to a railroad company franchises which impair the rights and privileges previously granted to another,[60] as to a ferry company.[61] Subsequent grants, however, which do not impair or prejudice exclusive rights previously granted are valid.[62]

Nonexclusive grant Where the grant of such a franchise to engage in the railroad business is not in terms exclusive, the same or a similar franchise may subsequently be granted to another company, even though the latter grant impairs the value of the former.[63] A provision in a charter that no person or corporation shall interfere with or injure any of the rights or privileges granted merely restrains the commission of unauthorized and illegal injuries and does not prevent the grant to another company of the right to engage in business in competition with the former company.[64]

§ 6. —— Determination of Convenience and Necessity

Under some statutes, the determination by a commission or tribunal designated for the purpose that a proposed railroad is justified by considerations of public convenience and necessity is a condition precedent to the establishment of such railroad. Whether the public convenience and necessity require construction of the rail line is a question of fact depending on the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

In some jurisdictions, under statutes providing therefor, the determination by a commission or tribunal designated for the purpose that a proposed railroad is justified by considerations of public convenience and necessity is a condition precedent to the establishment of such railroad.[65] So, under a federal statute regulating railroads, it is required that a certificate of convenience and necessity be obtained from the interstate commerce commission for the construction[66] or operation[67] of a railroad engaged or about to engage in interstate commerce, or for the building of any extension of any such line, as discussed infra § 54. A certificate is required, however, only in cases within the terms of the statute,[68] and the statute may be inapplicable to private construction of a rail line for private transportation.[69]

While the fact that a railroad is to be located wholly within one state and is to be built by an independent corporation does not necessarily prevent the application of the provisions of the federal statute requiring issue of a certificate by the interstate commerce commission,[70] if an intra-state line is to be used wholly in intra-state commerce, such certificate is not required,[71] and the mere fact

Purpose

(1) Purpose of statute requiring railroad undertaking construction of new line to obtain certificate of public convenience and necessity, and authorizing suit to enjoin violation of requirement, was to empower commission, in proceedings instituted by a carrier proposing to engage in transportation over or by means of additional line, authoritatively to decide whether it would be in the public interest.—Powell v U S, Ga, 57 S.Ct. 470, 300 U S 276, 81 L Ed 643

(2) Other statement of purpose see 51 C.J. p 415 note 88 [a].

Effect of lease

Action of secretary of war in leasing government line running to fort and approving railroad's employment of lessees to transport freight over tracks was held not inconsistent with exertion of authority of interstate commerce commission to grant or withhold certificate of public convenience and necessity, or to bring suit to enforce requirement to obtain certificate.—Powell v. that it might be used in interstate commerce will not justify enjoining its construction where it is not yet completed and there is no threat that it will be so used.[72]

Under the statutes in question, the commission or other designated tribunal generally has the duty of finding the facts, and in the exercise of reasonable judgment to determine whether the public convenience and necessity require the proposed construction of the railroad,[73] but the commission may not consider whether the proposed project is in the public interest unless it is one for construction or acquisition of a line as specified in the statute,[74] and, for lack of jurisdiction to determine that question, the commission may in certain circumstances be required to deny the application.[75] On presentation by the carrier of an application for a certificate of public convenience and necessity, the commission, in determining whether it has authority to consider the merits, may pass incidentally on the question whether the project is one covered by the statute, but the decision of that question is primarily one for the court, either in a suit to set aside the commission's order granting the certificate or in a suit to enjoin violation of the statute.[76]

Whether the public convenience and necessity require construction of the rail line is a question of fact depending on the facts and circumstances of the particular case,[77] considered from the viewpoint of the public and not of individuals affected,[78] and, if it does not in fact do so, a certificate should be refused;[79] but an adverse decision in one case does not render the matter res judicata on subsequent application by another company for permission to establish a similar service.[80] If a public necessity is shown, a certificate should be issued,[81] regardless of inconvenience to individuals.[82]

A certificate of convenience and necessity should not be denied because of a doubt as to whether the road would be a paying one,[83] nor is the fact that there is already adequate provision for through traffic sufficient reason for denying such certificate to another company, if there is not adequate provision for local traffic,[84] or the fact that a portion of the territory through which the proposed road is to run is adequately served, where another portion is not, and construction of the road as a whole is economically necessary.[85] The commission has power to authorize the construction of a railroad for the purpose of continuing competition between carriers,[86] and it has been held that the fact that the road for which application is made will give the public the advantage of desirable competition in transportation is ground for granting the certificate rather than denying it.[87]

The question is not whether public convenience

Railroad's application to interstate commerce commission for certificate of convenience and necessity does not preclude claim that contemplated new construction is solely intra-state.—Missouri - Kansas - Texas R. Co. v. Northern Oklahoma Rys., C.C.A.Okl., 25 F.2d 689, certiorari denied Northern Oklahoma Rys. v. Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co., 49 S. Ct. 13, 278 U.S. 610, 73 L.Ed. 536.

Administrative judgment

The granting or refusing of a certificate of public convenience and necessity for the construction of a railroad constitutes an exercise of administrative judgment under authority vested in the appropriate commission.—Indian Valley R. R. v. U. S., D.C.Cal., 52 F.2d 485, affirmed 54 S.Ct. 775, 292 U.S. 608, 78 L.Ed. 1469.

Traffic territory

Competing railroad carrier may enter into traffic territory of another when commission finds that public convenience and necessity require new construction.—Indian Valley R. R. v. U. S., D.C.Cal., 52 F.2d 485, affirmed 54 S.Ct. 775, 292 U.S. 608, 78 L.Ed. 1469.

and necessity require any railroad between the points in question, but whether they require the specific road proposed to be put into operation;[88] so the commission or tribunal ordinarily has no power to prescribe the route to be followed by the proposed railroad,[89] and no authority to issue a certificate on condition that the road shall be constructed on a specified line or a different route than that designated by applicant,[90] although there is authority for the view that the commission may consider other routes than that specified in the application.[91]

A certificate should be refused, however, if the commission determines that the company is not properly qualified or authorized to engage in the railroad business,[92] or has not the intention and ability to serve the public interest,[93] or if the proposed location or route of the road is different from that specified in the company's charter or articles of incorporation,[94] or where it appears that the proposed road would not pay expenses;[95] and the number of grade crossings which would be necessitated by a proposed road is to be considered in determining whether or not the certificate should be granted.[96] Under statutes in some jurisdictions so providing, a certificate of convenience and necessity is without effect where a specified portion of the capital stock of the railroad company has not been paid in cash.[97]

Notice of application. Where publication of notice of an application for a certificate or of the articles of incorporation of the applicant company is a condition precedent to the application, publication in each of the counties through which the proposed road is to extend is not necessary unless expressly required by statute.[98] Under a state statute empowering a regulatory commission to determine the matter of convenience and necessity, it is not necessary, with respect to purely interstate operations of a railroad, to publish notice of the filing of an application for a certificate, or to prove that there is any public convenience and necessity to be served.[99]

Opposition or resistance. While a railroad company operating within a particular territory has no right to hold its traffic against all competitors,[1] it has such an interest in an application made by another company for a certificate of convenience and necessity as to entitle it to intervene and be heard in opposition to, or resistance of, such application,[2] but it has no such interest as to authorize it to bring an independent proceeding to set aside an order granting a certificate.[3]

Evidence. The commission has a very wide discretion in determining what evidence it will or will not hear on an application for a certificate of convenience and necessity;[4] but the rejection of material and convincing evidence is reversible error.[5] It may require applicant to submit a map identifying the route of the proposed railroad.[6]

Rival applications. Where rival companies make application at the same time, the commission has jurisdiction to decide whether a certificate shall be issued to both or only to one, and if only to one, to which one.[7] Priority of organization or application does not give a particular company any right to such certificate as against another company desiring to construct a road between the same points,[8]

and, where the company to which a certificate has been granted fails or neglects to proceed with construction within the proper time, such delay is sufficient to authorize the commission to ignore any claim by it to protection against a subsequent applicant for a similar certificate.[9]

Review of decision. The decision of a railroad commission as to whether a proposed road is necessary may be reviewed on certiorari,[10] or by a special proceeding provided for by statute;[11] but the decision will not be reversed unless it clearly appears to have been based on erroneous legal principles or is contrary to the clear weight of evidence.[12]

Effect of failure to obtain certificate. Under the provisions of the federal statute requiring approval of the proposed construction or operation of certain railroad lines by the interstate commerce commission, any such construction or operation without obtaining the requisite certificate of necessity or convenience may be enjoined at the suit of the United States, the interstate commerce commission, or any party in interest.[13] By the term "party in interest" is meant one who has some special or peculiar interest which may be directly and materially affected by the alleged unlawful action;[14] and such a suit cannot be instituted by an individual unless he possesses something more than a common concern for obedience to the law, since the general or common interest finds protection in the permission to sue granted to public authorities.[15]

II. ORGANIZATION, EXISTENCE, AND FUNCTIONS OF RAILROAD COMPANIES

A. DOMESTIC COMPANIES

§ 7. In General

The right of a railroad company to corporate existence is derived from legislative enactment, and under the laws prevailing in different jurisdictions a railroad may be incorporated either by special act or under general law.

In accordance with principles governing corporations generally, discussed in Corporations § 23, the right of a railroad company to corporate existence can be derived only from a legislative enactment.[16] Such right of corporate existence cannot be divided up and made applicable to the different divisions of the railroad.[17] Corporations organized under statutes relating to railroads cannot escape the obligations imposed by law on railroad corporations,[18] and the duties and obligations imposed on such corporations, as found in the great mass of constitutional and statutory laws on the subject, are in effect written into the charter by operation of law.[19]

Special charter. In the absence of any constitutional provision to the contrary, a railroad corporation may be created by a special act or charter;[20] and a constitutional amendment prohibiting incorporation by special act does not affect a company created, prior to its adoption, by special charter;[21] nor does it apply to a subsequent amendment of the corporate charter by special act where the original charter was granted before adoption of the constitutional amendment;[22] nor, it has been held, does it deprive the legislature of power to amend by special act a special charter previously granted.[23]

General laws. Under a number of the statutes, a railroad company may be incorporated under general laws,[24] and, under some constitutions or amendments thereof, can be created only under the general laws, and not by special statute.[25] When a railroad company is organized under the general law, its articles of incorporation, together with the statutes applicable thereto, constitute the charter of the corporation,[26] but the mere repeal of a general railroad law does not affect or destroy the continued existence of a company previously incorporated thereunder.[27] While general laws are to be liberally construed,[28] a general statute for the incorporation of railroad companies does not authorize the incorporation of such company for private purposes, but only where it is for the public good.[29] A company incorporated under such a statute will be deemed an ordinary commercial railroad company,[30] as distinguished from either a street railroad company[31] or a narrow-gauge railroad company.[32] A statute authorizing a municipality or other corporation to subscribe for stock in a railroad corporation to be organized under the general law does not constitute a special act granting a charter to such railroad company or amending its charter;[33] nor does an express enactment subjecting railroad companies organized under special charters to the provisions of the general laws constitute a special amendatory act.[34]

Charter as contract. The corporate charter granted a railroad is in effect a contract between it and the state,[35] as well as between the corporation and its stockholders,[36] between the stockholders and the state,[37] and between the stockholders inter sese.[38]

§ 8. Incorporation and Existence

In order to create a railroad corporation de jure, there should be a substantial compliance with all statutory requirements, but irregularities in its organization will not preclude a railroad from becoming a corporation de facto.

Under the laws governing the organization of corporations generally, discussed in Corporations § 23 et seq, in order to create a railroad corporation de jure there must be at least a substantial compliance with all conditions precedent prescribed by statute,[39] including provisions as to the minimum number of persons who may unite to form the corporation;[40] and the courts have no power to dispense with statutory requirements or to supply statutory essentials, whatever may be the benefit, convenience, or necessity of so doing,[41] since what the statute requires to be done in order to complete the organization of a railroad corporation as a body politic is mandatory and essential, and without compliance therewith the charter is void and the incorporation is incomplete.[42]

Defects or irregularities in the organization of a railroad corporation are not, however, necessarily fatal to its existence,[43] and notwithstanding such defects it may be at least a corporation de facto.[44] Such irregularities or defects are cured by a subsequent legislative enactment recognizing or authorizing the company's existence as a corporation.[45]

Corporators. Unless otherwise provided by law, it is not necessary that the corporators of a railroad company shall be residents of, and dwellers in, the state of incorporation.[46] There is nothing to prevent officers and employees of one railroad company from organizing another if they act in good faith, even though the organization of the new company is for the benefit of the older one.[47]

Approval of Interstate Commerce Commission has been held not essential to the valid incorporation of a railroad company although it is to be engaged in interstate commerce.[48]

Conditions subsequent. A failure to comply with a condition subsequent in a statute incorporating or authorizing the incorporation of a railroad company does not affect the validity of its organization or its existence,[49] although it may subject the franchises of the corporation to forfeiture at the instance of the state, as discussed infra § 18.

Reincorporation. Where a railroad company is reincorporated after having been dissolved because of a defective organization, it is subject to the laws in effect at the time of reincorporation and must comply therewith as in the case of a new company.[50]

Collateral attack. The valid corporate existence of a railroad company may not be collaterally attacked.[51]

§ 9. —— Subscription to, and Payment of, Portion of Stock

Under some provisions of law it is a prerequisite to the organization of a railroad corporation that shares of stock to a certain amount shall be subscribed and paid for.

Under constitutions, statutes, or charters providing therefor, it is a prerequisite to the valid organization of a railroad company that shares to a certain amount shall be subscribed,[52] and that a certain portion or per cent of such subscription shall be paid.[53] It is not necessary, under such provisions, that the required per cent be paid on each subscription at the time of making it or previous to the filing of the articles of association, but it is sufficient if the cash payments, by whomsoever made, amount in the aggregate to a sum equal to the required per cent of the required capital stock.[54] Subscriptions, within the meaning of such provisions, must be unconditional;[55] and conditional subscriptions made before organization cannot be considered in determining whether the requisite amount of stock has been subscribed to authorize the organization.[56] Under statutes requiring payment to be made in cash, a check drawn in good faith against a sufficient fund in a solvent bank is ordinarily held to be sufficient,[57] as is a deposit of the required amount in a solvent bank, to the credit of the company and subject to its checks.[58]

§ 10. —— Certificate or Articles of Incorporation

a. In general
b. Specification of termini

a. In General

The corporators should effect a substantial compliance with all statutory provisions governing the certificate or articles of incorporation, as with respect to its execution, form and contents, and the filing thereof.

The corporators of a railroad company should comply substantially with statutory provisions relative to the execution of its certificate or articles of incorporation[59] and the acknowledgment thereof,[60] and should attach thereto such supporting affidavits as may be required.[61] Statutes providing that failure to attach the requisite supporting affidavits may subsequently be remedied by filing a curative affidavit are intended to provide a remedy for the defect so as to preserve the rights of stockholders.[62]

Form and contents. Where the form of the certificate or articles of incorporation of a railroad company is prescribed by statute, it must be followed.[63] There should be a substantial compliance with statutory provisions requiring the certificate or articles to specify the object and purposes of the company,[64] the length of the road,[65] the name assumed by the company and by which it is to be known,[66] its principal place of business,[67] the names of the directors,[68] and other matters required to be shown.[69] Although the certificate or articles are defective, they may be sufficient to constitute the company a corporation de facto.[70] Matters not required by statute to be stated need not be set forth in the certificate or articles,[71] and provisions thereof as to such matters may be treated as surplusage.[72]

Filing. The corporators of a railroad company should comply substantially with statutory requirements as to the filing or registration of its certificate or articles of incorporation.[73] The filing of the articles of incorporation or association is, however, no part of such articles, but is a fact separate from, and independent of, them.[74] An indorsement of filing is not itself the filing,[75] but is at most prima facie evidence of the time of filing,[76] as to which parol evidence is also admissible.[77]

Amendments to a certificate or articles of incorporation must comply with statutory provisions relative thereto.[78] If a place which should be named as on the route of a railroad is omitted, such omission may be cured by amendment of the charter,[79] although an amendment attempting to effect a change in the proposed route and terminus of a railroad is insufficient where a certificate of change and a map and survey have not been filed as required by statute;[80] and no such change can be made by amendment under a statute providing merely for the cure of informalities or defects in the original articles or certificate.[81]

b. Specification of Termini

In the absence of statute so requiring, the charter of a railroad need not name its termini; but where statute so requires it should do so, with at least reasonable certainty.

In the absence of statute requiring it, the charter or articles of incorporation of a railroad company need not state the termini of the railroad proposed to be constructed or operated by the corporation.[82] Where, however, it is provided by statute that the termini shall be designated or described therein, there should be a substantial compliance with such requirement.[83] On the other hand, the purpose of providing for such designation is only to indicate the general location and direction of the railroad,[84] and so it has been said that great latitude should be allowed in naming the termini,[85] and that a statute requiring them to be designated should be liberally construed.[86] Accordingly, it is necessary to designate the termini only with reasonable certainty.[87] The designation of a particular town or city as a terminus is sufficient, without a more specific statement of the exact place of beginning or ending of the road;[88] but unless otherwise provided by statute it is not necessary that a city or town be named as a terminus,[89] and the designation of any point sufficiently described to be readily ascertainable is sufficient.[90] Where the designation of the termini indicates that the proposed railroad is for a private use rather than a public one, a charter should be refused.[91]

Railroad running to or from place outside the state. Under a statute requiring the termini of a proposed railroad to be specified in the charter or articles, termini within the state must be designated, in view of the legislature's lack of power to authorize construction or operation of a railroad outside the state.[92] Where the road is to extend through a state from or to points outside the state, it is sufficient to designate as termini the places where the road is to cross the state line,[93] but it is not necessary that the precise points be named as long as they are otherwise sufficiently described.[94] So the statute is complied with as designating as a terminus a point outside the state where it is so near the state line that the place where the road, passing to such terminus along the route indicated by the charter, would intersect the line may be ascertained with reasonable certainty;[95] and the designation of a city outside the state as a terminus is sufficient where a boundary of such city is coincident with the state line.[96]

Branch lines. A statute requiring the charter or articles to state the termini of the road has been held to apply only to the main line of the railroad,[97] and not to require the specification of termini of branch lines.[98]

Route. Unless otherwise provided by statute the charter or articles of a railroad company need not contain any description of the route of the proposed railroad except as the specification of the termini may be required,[99] although the route may be generally stated therein.[1] Under some statutes, however, the county or counties, city or cities, through which the railroad is to pass should be stated,[2] and it is sometimes required that the route of a railroad through a city or town shall be designated in order that the company may obtain proper permission to occupy the streets over which it is intended to build the road.[3] A statute requiring the charter to name the cities and towns through or near which the railroad is to run does not mean that every incorporated place through or past which the road is eventually laid out must be named,[4] since the object of such provision is merely to procure a description of the general location and direction of the proposed road;[5] and, in any event, if a place which should be named is omitted, the failure to name it may be cured by amendment of the charter, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section. A more definite designation of the route than is required by statute is mere surplusage and does not restrict the company to the route so designated.[6]

§ 11. —— Acceptance of Charter

Where a railroad company is formed by a special charter, the incorporation is not complete until the charter is accepted by the corporators.[7] On due acceptance, however, of a special act vesting designated persons with corporate powers and declaring them to be a corporation, the corporation is created eo instante,[8] and acceptance of the charter is all that need be shown to prove corporate existence,[9] provided the grant of corporate capacity is not subject to any conditions precedent, as discussed supra § 10.

of any provision requiring it, the acceptance of a charter in any formal manner is not necessary[10] Acceptance may be implied from the circumstances,[11] as where the act creating the corporation was passed at the request of the directors designated in the charter.[12] Acceptance may also be implied from acts done in apparent reliance on the charter,[13] such as the organization of the company pursuant to its provisions,[14] the exercise of corporate powers,[15] the construction and operation by the company of a part of its railroad,[16] the subsequent obtainment of an amendment to the charter,[17] or other unequivocal acts,[18] even though performed outside the territorial limits of the state by which the charter was granted.[19] Without an organization of the corporation under the charter there can be no acceptance.[20]

Conditions or restrictions. As a general rule, when a charter is granted, whether it is one of creation, or an amendment to a preexisting charter, it must either be accepted or rejected as offered and without condition.[21] Acceptance of the privileges conferred by the charter constitutes a submission to the restrictions and reservations accompanying the grant,[22] and to all conditions imposed thereby,[23] and carries with it as well an assumption of all the duties and obligations imposed by general law except as modified by the special charter.[24]

§ 12. —— Organization Fee or Tax

Statutes imposing organization taxes on all corporations without specification of railroad corporations have been held nevertheless applicable to the latter, but, where general statutes and statutes specifically covering railroads coexist, the general statutes may be held inapplicable to railroads

Statutes imposing on corporations organizing in the state an organization fee or tax measured ordinarily by a specified per cent of the authorized capital of the company, and in terms applicable to every corporation organized and doing business under the laws of the state, are applicable to railroad corporations, even though railroads are not specifically referred to therein, unless the contrary intention appears,[25] but, where there are coexisting general statutes and statutes specifically applicable to railroads, the general statutes may be held inapplicable[26] Unless otherwise provided by statute, however, failure to pay an organization tax does not prevent the company from being a corporation,[27] although it may be prohibited from carrying on its business until the tax has been paid, as discussed infra § 27. Under such a statute a railroad company formed by the consolidation of two or more others is subject to the tax even though the consolidating companies had paid taxes on their original organization,[28] and where the property and franchises of a railroad company are sold under foreclosure and a new company formed it is liable for the tax;[29] but the statute has no application where there is merely a purchase of the property and franchises of one railroad company by another.[30] The mere extension of a charter has been held not to constitute the incorporation of a new company so as to require payment of the fees prescribed for incorporation,[31] but, where a statute so provides, the tax is payable on an extension of the charter.[32]

Where the statute exempts from payment of an incorporation tax a railroad which has built a railway into or through the state, the secretary of state may not refuse to renew the license of such a railroad on the ground that the statute is unconstitutional, since his duties are purely ministerial.[33]

License fees or privilege taxes imposed on railroads are discussed infra § 27.

Amendment tax. Under a statute providing that, on the filing by a railroad company of an amendment to its charter, it shall pay a tax based on its authorized capital, a company filing an amendment not increasing its capital stock is not subject to such tax;[34] and, where by amendment the capital stock is increased, the tax is required to be paid on the increase only, and not on the original capital.[35]

§ 13. Capital and Stock

a. In general
b. Issuance and distribution

a. In General

The general rules governing questions as to the capital, stock, and stockholders of corporations ordinarily control in respect of such questions when arising in connection with railroad companies.

Except as modified by special constitutional or statutory provisions relating to railroad companies, the general rules governing the capital stock and stockholders of corporations, discussed in Corporations §§ 192-714, control in respect of such matters when arising in connection with railroad companies,[36] as in the case of questions as to dividends.[37]

Increase of capital stock. In the exercise of its broad power to regulate railroad companies, the legislature has authority to enact statutes regulating the increase of their capital stock and prescribing the purposes for which and the conditions on which such an increase may be made,[38] in order to prevent secrecy of operation and accounts and the issuance of fictitious or watered stock.[39] Where such a statute exists, the capital stock of a railroad company may be increased only in the manner and on the conditions thereby prescribed;[40] and such a provision is a restriction on a general statute permitting corporations by their by-laws to fix the amount of capital stock.[41] Under a statute providing for increases of stock only with the consent of a majority of the stockholders, no distinction is to be made between holders of common and preferred stock, for such purpose,[42] and the stock may be increased with the consent of the majority, without regard to the character of their stock.[43] A statute prohibiting the issuance of preferred stock without the consent of all the stockholders does not prevent a railroad company which has issued preferred stock from increasing it in the manner provided by statute without such consent.[44] Where two or more statutes relating to increases of capital stock each provide complete modes thereof, they will not be regarded as in conflict,[45] and they should be construed as providing different manners of increase of the capital stock.[46]

A statute requiring public utilities to pay specified fees for increases of their stock is applicable to railroad companies.[47]

Redemption of stock. Where stock of a railroad corporation is issued on the condition that it may be redeemed by the company, the exercise of the right to redeem is not subject to a general statutory provision permitting corporations to reduce their stock only with the consent of a majority of the stockholders,[48] and redemption may be made by the directors of the company as a corporate act.[49] A redemption of stock does not constitute a violation of a statute prohibiting corporations from purchasing their own stock.[50]

Expenditure of capital on railroad. Under some statutory provisions a railroad company is required to expend a certain per cent of its capital on the road within a specified time,[51] but a failure to make such expenditure within the required time may not be asserted collaterally.[52] Such a provision has been held to apply to a railroad company formed by the consolidation of others.[53]

b. Issuance and Distribution

Stock should be issued in proportion to the respective interests of the recipients. Generally speaking, provisions forbidding stock of railroads to be issued for anything other than money, labor, or property do not require that the consideration received should be of equal market value with the stock issued.

In accordance with the rules applicable to corporations generally, discussed in Corporations §§ 196–209, stock of a railroad company is properly issued and distributed to the persons concerned in the proportions of their respective interests.[54] Where receipts for payments made are surrendered and stock certificates accepted in exchange for the principal amount thereof, no right exists to demand additional stock to the amount of the interest accrued on such payments.[55]

Consideration. Constitutional or statutory provisions prohibiting railroad companies from issuing capital stock except for money, labor, or property, and declaring fictitious issues of stock invalid, do not require that the money, labor, or property received shall be of equal value in the market with the stock issued therefor,[56] and in the absence of fraud the validity of the stock issued does not depend on the question of such equality,[57] although an exchange of new stock for stocks or bonds of lesser value is invalid.[58] Under such a provision stock may be issued in exchange for outstanding bonds of the company,[59] but an issue of paid-up stock as a bonus to purchasers or underwriters of bonds of the company is invalid.[60] Notes secured by trust deeds conveying land may legally be accepted in payment for stock under such a provision.[61] Under a statute requiring lands taken in exchange for stock to be sold, the question of a reasonable time for such sale is one of fact.[62] Stock issued for a consideration other than that permitted by law is void.[63]

Exchange of common for preferred stock. A provision in the articles of incorporation of a railroad company for the exchange of common stock for preferred stock is not modified or avoided by a statute requiring the approval by a public utility commission of every stock issue,[64] but the obligation is imposed on the company to use due diligence to § 14. Subscriptions to Stock; Rights and Liabilities of Stockholders

a. Subscriptions
b. Rights and liabilities of stockholders

a. Subscriptions

(1) In general
(2) Conditional subscriptions

(1) In General

Liability for the price or value of railroad stock must be based on contract, express or implied. Under statutes requiring a certain portion of the stock subscription to be paid at the time of subscribing, no subscription is valid until the required payment has been made.

In general, any liability for the price or value of the stock of a railroad company must be founded on a valid contract, express or implied.[66] Ordinarily no formal acceptance of a subscription by the company is required,[67] and failure to reject a subscription renders the contract sufficiently mutual to be effective.[68] A contract with a railroad company to construct a railroad in return for an agreed amount of stock does not constitute a subscription for such stock so as to render the contractor liable for the par value thereof.[69] Where several subscribers sign the same subscription agreement by which each agrees to purchase the amount of railroad stock set opposite his name, the obligation of each subscriber is several and not joint.[70]

Validity. A subscription is not invalid or unenforceable because at the time it is made the issuance of stock subscribed for has not been approved by a state railroad commission or public utility commission, where required by law, provided such approval is subsequently given.[71] Where a subscription contract is not conditioned on construction or completion of the road, failure of the company or its inability to carry out its purpose does not release the subscribers;[72] and, in the absence of any fraud inducing it, a subscription is not rendered invalid by the fact that the stock subscribed for is valueless.[73]

Effect. Unless otherwise provided by statute, one who subscribes to the stock of a railroad company prior to its organization becomes liable therefor as soon as the company is organized.[74] A subscription creates a debt against the subscriber for any unpaid balance thereof,[75] and an assignment or transfer of the stock by him does not relieve him of such liability without the consent of the directors.[76] The breach of a subscription contract by either party renders him liable in damages to the other party.[77]

Delivery of certificates. Under a statute providing for the delivery of certificates of stock to subscribers when payment therefor has been fully made, a subscriber is not entitled to have delivery until he has paid the full amount of such subscription.[78]

Payment. Where the statute requires a specified portion of the amount of a subscription to the stock of a railroad company to be paid at the time of subscribing, no subscription is valid until the required portion has been paid,[79] and each subscription must be deemed provisional or conditional pending such payment;[80] but actual payment at any time made with intent to effectuate and complete the subscription is sufficient therefor.[81] Such a statute has been held to relate to subscriptions made after organization of the company as distinguished from those required as a condition to its valid organization.[82]

Interest on subscriptions. Under some statutes providing for the payment by railroad companies of interest on amounts paid for stock up to the time of making the first dividend, interest runs only from the time at which payment is made to the company.[83]

(2) Conditional Subscriptions

In the absence of charter or statutory restrictions, subscriptions to the stock of a railroad may be made conditional.

Unless restricted by statute or its charter, the promoters or officers of a railroad company have the right to receive subscriptions to its stock conditioned on such terms as may be accepted or agreed on,[84] and as soon as the condition has happened or been performed the subscription becomes binding and enforceable.[85] Where the time within which the condition is to be performed is not specified, a reasonable time is allowed therefor.[86] A subscription conditioned on the completion of the railroad does not become absolute as long as a necessary bridge is uncompleted, although rolling stock is being transported by a ferry pending completion.[87] Where one has subscribed to the stock of a railroad company on condition, he may, with the assent of the company, vary the conditions,[88] or make his subscription absolute,[89] and where he executes a note containing an absolute promise to pay there is a presumption that he undertook to pay it on sufficient consideration.[90]

Purpose of subscription. The mere recital in a subscription of the purpose for which the capital is subscribed,[91] as for the construction or extension of the railroad to a specified point,[92] does not make the subscription conditional.

Parol evidence is not admissible to show that a subscription absolute on its face was made on a condition.[93]

b. Rights and Liabilities of Stockholders

The stockholders of a railroad corporation have final control of its affairs. Under contract or statute the stockholders may incur a personal liability for the obligations of the railroad company.

As in the case of corporations generally, as discussed in Corporations § 482 et seq, the stockholders of a railroad company have the final control of its affairs,[94] and a provision in its charter for government directors does not abrogate their rights[95]

Personal liability of stockholders of railroads for railroad obligations may arise from contract[96] or from statute.[97] Under some statutes the stockholders of a railroad company are liable for all debts owing to laborers or servants for services performed for the company[98] The liability expressly imposed on stockholders of railroad companies for all the debts due or owing to any of its laborers and servants for services performed for the corporation has been said to extend to the services of a civil engineer, master mechanic, and conductor,[99] but an independent contractor for the construction of the railroad is not a laborer or servant within such a statute,[1] nor does such a statute include debts due a laborer employed by an independent contractor in the construction of the railroad[2] An inseparable part of a claim against a railroad corporation for labor not performed by the claimant himself is not a debt due a laborer under the statute.[3]

Statutes exempting stockholders of railroads from the liability imposed on stockholders of other corporations have been construed to apply not merely to corporations operating railroads but also to those organized for the purpose of furnishing materials for building and equipping them.[4]

Meetings Unless otherwise provided by statute or charter, stockholders present at a regular annual meeting may transact the business of the meeting, including the election of officers and directors, even though a majority in interest or in number of stockholders is not present;[5] but, where a statute requires the presence of a majority, no legal meeting of the stockholders of a railroad may be held in the absence of a majority of the stock being represented.[6] Where a railroad company is incorporated in two or more states, a stockholders' meeting held in one of them and conducted in accordance with its laws is regular and valid,[7] although the laws of another of such states require such meetings to be differently conducted.[8]

Voting. The rules governing the voting rights of stockholders in corporations generally, discussed in Corporations §§ 547–553, ordinarily control in the case of stockholders of a railroad corporation.[9]

Actions. In an action by a minority stockholder of a railroad company against a majority stockholder wherein unfair and improper management of the company is alleged, the burden of proof is on plaintiff,[10] but as to specific contracts made with the company by a managing stockholder the burden is on him to show the fairness and justness of his dealings.[11]

§ 15. Officers and Agents

a. In general
b Election or appointment and qualification
c. Powers and authority
d. Personal rights and liabilities

a. In General

The general rules with respect to officers and agents of corporations apply with respect to officers and agents of railroad corporations

The general rules with respect to officers and agents of corporations apply with respect to officers and agents of railroad corporations.[12] The general officers of a railroad company are the president, vice president, general manager, secretary, and treasurer, selected by the corporation through its board of directors.[13] Persons employed in connection with the operation of trains, such as a yardmaster, roundhouse foreman, or conductor, are not officers of the corporation.[14] In common acceptation, the "agent" of a railroad company is the person representing the company at a station or depot on its line.[15] "Freight solicitor" is a term sometimes applied to an officer or employee of a railroad corporation.[16] A railway policeman may not do any act on behalf of the state until he has complied with statutory provisions requiring appointments as railway policemen to be registered and ratified.[17]

b. Election or Appointment and Qualification

In the absence of special statutory or charter provisions, the election or appointment, qualification, and tenure of officers and agents of railroad companies are governed by the rules applicable to corporations generally.

Under special statutes conferring the right, holders of certificates of indebtedness may vote for directors [25]

c. Powers and Authority

(1) In general
(2) Particular officers and agents
(3) Imputation of knowledge of agent to railroad company

(1) In General

For ordinary purposes the authority of a railroad company is vested in its board of directors.

Broadly speaking, for ordinary purposes the authority of a railroad company is vested in its board of directors,[26] and, except as otherwise provided by statute or charter, the power of its officers and agents depends on the action of the directors in conferring power on them,[27] subject to the qualification that an officer or agent who has or is given authority to do particular acts has implied power to do whatever is reasonably necessary to perform his duties [28] A railroad company is civilly liable for torts committed by its agents under its express or implied authority.[29]

One dealing with an officer or agent ordinarily is charged with the duty of ascertaining his authority to bind the company,[30] the burden of proving such authority rests on the person asserting it,[31] and, in the absence of any evidence of custom or precedent indicating authority of an agent to make a contract, one dealing with the agent must at his peril ascertain the scope of the agent's authority in respect of the making of such a contract.[32] However, as in the case of other agents, under rules discussed in Agency § 96, the rights of persons dealing with an agent of a railroad company depend not on the actual limitations placed on his power by his superiors, but on the apparent scope of his authority,[33] and such persons are not bound to take notice of private instructions given to, or restrictions imposed on, one who has been put forward as a general agent.[34] In general, the mere fact that an agent assumes authority does not authorize

Access to witness

There is no presumption that a railroad corporation has authorized its local agent to hinder access by the counsel of an adverse suitor to a witness in the employment of the company, and, unless the delegation of such authority appears in evidence, the corporation will not be affected by conduct of the agent tending to prevent such access—Marsh v. others to believe that he possesses it rightfully,[35] since it is the conduct of the company and not that of the agent which determines the apparent scope of his authority;[36] but, when a communication has been addressed to the company, the individual responding thereto and assuming to represent the company will be presumed to be the proper officer therefor until the contrary appears.[37]

Fraudulent acts An act of an agent done in pursuance of a conspiracy to defraud third persons to whom the railroad company owes no duty is not within the scope of his employment or binding on the company[38] unless it has knowledge of facts from which it could reasonably anticipate the wrong to such persons.[39] On the other hand, a railroad is a party to a deliberate plan to form a corporation technically independent of it, but which would operate as its agency to control other roads or their securities contrary to law where its officials participate in such formation and where in addition it appears that the board of directors formally went on record as stating that the purposes of the new corporation would be in the interests of the railroad,[40] and, although the railroad company is a legal entity theoretically incapable of wrongful or ultra vires acts, it may not deny liability when its agents acting within the scope of their duties enter into a combination or agreement to serve its purposes,[41] and in such a case the railroad company may be guilty of constructive fraud.[42]

Mistake of fellow agent. The railroad company cannot escape liability on a contract made for it by an authorized agent merely because such agent relied on mistaken information furnished him by another agent of the company.[43]

Officers of lessee company An officer or agent of a railroad company by whom a railroad is leased can bind only his own company and not the lessor or owning company.[44]

Ratification. The acts of an officer or agent of a railroad company may be ratified by it in accordance with the ordinary rules as to ratification;[45] and the company is responsible for the agent's acts when ratified.[46]

(2) Particular Officers and Agents

The general rules of corporate law ordinarily serve to define the power and authority of particular officers and agents of railroad companies.

Except as may be otherwise provided by statute,[47] or the charter of a railroad company, or by regulations and by-laws duly adopted, the powers and functions of the respective officers and agents of such company are governed by the rules applicable to corporations generally.[48]

The authority of officers and agents to bind a railroad company to pay for medical or surgical attendance or for board and lodging is discussed in Corporations § 1050 c.

Directors While the general authority over a railroad company is treated for most purposes as vested in its board of directors, as discussed supra subdivision c(1) of this section, the power of di-

Honest convictions

The actions of the officers and directors of a railroad company in forming and managing a corporation to serve the interests of the railroad in the accomplishment of a purpose which it could not accomplish in its own capacity, but with the honest conviction that they were fulfilling their duties, constituted at most a constructive fraud or legal fraud on those who suffered.—Overfield v. District traffic agent

In suit by former tenant to recover unamortized value of buildings on the rented land which had been erected by plaintiff and by prior tenant from whom plaintiff had purchased lease, evidence failed to establish that a district traffic agent of railroad who allegedly had orally assured plaintiff that lease would be renewed on expiration of lease term, for such time as would enable plaintiff to amortize plaintiff's investment in buildings on land, had authority to make such oral agreement.—Stilley v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., Miss., 47 So.2d 840.

rectors is derivative only, and in order to bind the company they must keep within the scope of the authority conferred on them by the stockholders.[49] The directors cannot bind the stockholders without their assent to duties or responsibilities not cognate to the ends and purposes of the company's organization,[50] nor, in general, can they bind the company by oral declarations or promises[51] Subject to such qualifications, the directors may contract for the construction or reconstruction of the road[52] A contract made by a single director ordinarily is not binding on the company,[53] even though he owns a majority of its stock.[54]

President. By common usage the president of a railroad company is treated as its executive head,[55] and he may perform for the company, without special or express authority, such ordinary routine acts as are incident to the execution of the trust reposed in him,[56] and direct the performance of such acts by subordinate employees.[57] He has no authority, however, merely by virtue of his office, to locate or contract for the location of the road or its termini,[58] or stations, offices, shops, or roundhouses,[59] to invoke the right of eminent domain,[60] to contract for the construction of the road,[61] to execute a mortgage on the property of the company,[62] or to sell or convey land belonging to the company.[63]

Vice president. The vice president, like the president, has general and discretionary authority by virtue of his office to carry out his ordinary and routine duties without express authorization by the directors,[64] but he has no power to bind the company by any act or contract not authorized by the by-laws,[65] and when acting in the place of the president he has no implied authority beyond that possessed by the president.[66]

General superintendent or manager. The general superintendent or general manager of a railroad company may bind it by such acts and contracts as are within the general scope of his agency and incident to his duties,[67] as by a contract for fencing the right of way[68] or an offer of an award for the apprehension of persons obstructing the railroad;[69] but he has no power to sell property of the company without authority from the directors.[70]

Division superintendent. The authority of the superintendent or assistant superintendent of a division of a railroad to dispose of perishable freight stopped in transit by an emergency is inferable without evidence.[71] On the other hand, he has no implied authority to bind the company by an agreement to give life employment to an employee of the company in settlement of a claim for personal injuries[72]

General attorney. Where the general attorney of a railroad company has power to employ local attorneys, the employment by him of a local attorney at a yearly salary or retainer is within his apparent authority, and binding on the company,[73] even though he had private instructions to make no such contract, where such instructions were not known to the attorney employed.[74]

Railroad physician or surgeon may bind the railroad where he acts within the scope of his authority,[75] but not otherwise.[76] The physician or surgeon in charge of a hospital maintained by a railroad company for its employees has no authority to bind the company by promising to notify third persons of the condition of an inmate or patient,[77] and the company is not liable for his failure to perform such a promise.[78] The power of a railroad physician to bind the company in respect of medical or surgical attendance is discussed in Corporations § 1050 c.

Chief or subordinate engineer. A chief engineer on whom authority has been conferred to make contracts for the construction of a railroad has no implied power to contract for the construction of private spur tracks or branches.[79] Whether a division engineer, intrusted with control and maintenance of track and bridges of his territory, has authority to make contracts of employment in connection with such control depends on the facts of the particular case.[80] A civil engineer merely placed in control or supervision of construction work has no implied authority to bind the company by a contract for any such construction.[81] One employed as chief engineer of a railroad to survey and establish its line has apparent authority to employ such subordinates, and to incur such expenses, as are reasonably suitable to the purposes for which he is employed.[82]

Claim agent. The scope of the authority of a claim agent of a railroad company is, in the absence of express statute, not defined by law,[83] and ordinarily depends on what powers have been conferred on him, which is a question of fact in each case.[84] A general claim agent has authority to refuse or allow claims against the company,[85] and to make settlement of such claims,[86] and ordinarily the company is bound by agreements for settlements made by him,[87] at least where claimant had no knowledge of any limitation on his power.[88] In the absence of express authority the claim agent has no power to make a contract for employment,[89] and in the absence of proper proof of authority a claim agent will be held unauthorized to promise permanent employment in settlement of a damage claim.[90] A claim agent authorized only to ascertain the amount for which a claim can be settled has no authority to settle the claim or bind the company to pay any specific amount.[91] The authority of a railroad claim agent to bind the road for medical attention for injured employees or others is considered in Corporations § 1050 c (2) (a).

Special agent. A railroad policeman or special agent having authority to employ guards may bind the company to protect one employed as such in going to undertake his duties.[92]

ing agent includes power to bind the company for supplies purchased by him for its use.[93]

Train crew, conductor. Unless specially authorized, members of a train crew,[94] including the conductor,[95] have no general authority to make contracts for the railroad company or to employ servants or agents for it[96] unless there is a custom to the contrary actually or presumptively known to the officers of the company,[97] but in cases of necessity or emergency, where circumstances demand it, a conductor or other trainman may bind the company by such contracts of employment or otherwise as are clearly necessary to enable him to carry out his prescribed duties.[98] Whether such necessity or emergency exists as impliedly to confer such power is a question of fact dependent on the circumstances of each case.[99] The authority of a conductor ordinarily extends to the control of the movements of his train and the immediate direction of employees engaged in operating the train,[1] and he is, in the absence of any superior officer, the general agent of the company as far as the direction and immediate management of the train are concerned when it is out on the road;[2] so, in emergency or necessity, he has large control over his subordinates,[3] and may command their obedience[4] and discharge one who refuses to obey.[5]

Station agents ordinarily have no implied authority to make contracts in behalf of the railroad company,[6] and so, in the absence of express authorization, a station agent cannot bind the company by a contract of employment[7] or by a contract for the feeding and care of live stock injured in transit,[8] and has no authority to rent or lease a building for the transaction of the company's business[9] or to extend the liability imposed by law on the company as a carrier;[10] nor can he be said to act as the representative of the company or within the scope of his employment in accusing a third person of the theft of personal property from another employee.[11] In emergencies, however, his general powers vest a station agent with authority to make such contracts in behalf of the company as may be necessary under the circumstances,[12] and an assistant station agent has authority in the station agent's absence to make any contracts within the scope of the regular agent's duties,[13] although on completion of acts and contracts essential to meet the emergency the agent or his assistant may lack power to proceed further in the matter.[14] It is within the apparent authority of a station agent to maintain proper sanitary conditions on the premises under his control,[15] and a proper contract made by him in connection therewith is binding on the company.[16]

Foremen The mere fact that one is a foreman on a railroad does not necessarily authorize him to hire others[18] or to fix the terms of their employment.[19]

The foreman of a roundhouse or a master mechanic authorized to hire employees has no power, in the absence of special authorization, to make a contract for permanent or lifetime employment[20] or to agree that the employee shall not be discharged except for cause.[21]

A section foreman having authority to hire laborers for work upon the railroad has apparent authority to state the terms of the contract of employment.[22]

Laborer. A railroad laborer cannot bind the company by contract in the absence of express authority so to do.[23]

(3) Imputation of Knowledge of Agent to Railroad Company

The knowledge of an officer of a railroad company obtained in the discharge of his official duties is the knowledge of the company, but knowledge of an agent as to matters outside the scope of his employment cannot be imputed to the company.

Knowledge of, or notice to, an officer or agent of a railroad company will be imputed to the company only with respect to matters which the officer or agent has power or authority to regulate or with which he has power to deal [24] The knowledge of any officer obtained in the discharge of his official duties is the knowledge of the company,[25] but knowledge of an agent as to matters outside the scope of his employment cannot be imputed to the company.[26] Knowledge of a railroad employee acquired in a different capacity and not imparted to the company may not be charged to it [27]

d. Personal Rights and Liabilities

The general rules governing corporate officers and agents ordinarily are applicable in defining the personal rights and liabilities of railroad officers and agents.

The general rules governing the rights and liabilities of corporate officers and agents, discussed in Corporations §§ 761–932, ordinarily control in respect of the rights and liabilities of railroad officers and agents,[28] except as modified by special statutory provisions [29] Officers who contract with respect to the construction of a railroad as a personal speculation and not in behalf of the company are personally liable on their contracts [30]

Directors ordinarily are not liable for debts contracted by them in behalf of the company,[31] even though such debts exceed in amount a limitation imposed by statute,[32] but directors who participate in an illegal refunding plan are accountable to the company for damage sustained by it as a result of their illegal acts.[33] While ordinarily directors are held to be trustees for the company of land purchased by them which is necessary to its purposes, as discussed in Corporations § 784, a director who buys land in good faith cannot be held to be a trustee thereof where the route of the railroad is subsequently changed so as to pass through such land [34] Directors rightfully entitled to office, although not in actual possession thereof, may maintain against mere intruders an action for money had and received as fees [35]

no such bond has been required the president has been held personally liable for defalcations of the secretary to the amount of the bond the secretary should have given [36]

Conductor. A railroad conductor is liable to the company for the amount of fares which he improperly failed to collect [37]

Ticket agent. A ticket agent who engages in buying and selling joint tickets issued by other roads is liable to his company for any profits made by him,[38] but he may not be held liable for loss resulting from mistakes made in the sale of tickets generally, where there was no negligence on his part [39]

A freight agent who was appointed by a railroad company under a printed contract by which agents who furnish a warehouse rent free to the company are entitled to retain certain charges cannot maintain an action for rent of a warehouse on an implied contract against the company, if he has retained such charges.[40]

Railroad policeman. A policeman commissioned by the state on the application of a railroad company is not entitled to costs in a criminal proceeding as though he were a constable or public officer,[41] and his compensation depends on an agreement between him and the company for which he has been appointed.[42]

Remedies. Redress for fraudulent acts of officers ordinarily is to be obtained in a suit brought by the company,[43] unless it refuses to bring suit, in which case a stockholder may sue [44] Where an officer of the railroad violates his fiduciary duty to it in the consummation of a transaction, the road may rescind such transaction,[45] but if the officer acted in good faith the transaction may not be rescinded merely because he exercised poor judgment in the matter.[46]

§ 16. Powers

a. In general
b. Charging for transportation
c. Engaging in other business

a. In General

A railroad company possesses and may exercise only such powers as are conferred on it by charter or statute.

The statute under which a railroad company is organized is the primary source of its corporate power,[47] and it possesses and may exercise only such powers as are conferred on it by its charter or by governing statutes [48] Limitations prescribed by statute are binding on the company regardless of anything that may appear in its articles of incorporation,[49] which can confer on it no greater power than that authorized by the statute which gives it life.[50] Powers fairly implied in the charter or statute are, however, granted to the company as well as those expressed,[51] and it possesses, broadly speaking, all the rights or powers which are essential to the execution of its corporate purposes;[52] but the charter or statute still remains the measure of such power.[53]

Unless otherwise provided by statute or its charter, a railroad company ordinarily possesses all of the powers conferred by law on strictly private corporations, as well as those conferred on railroad corporations as such,[54] but the rule is subject to the qualification that a railroad company may exercise powers conferred by general corporation statutes only as far as they are appropriate to, and not inconsistent with, the railroad statutes under which the company is organized,[55] and so a railroad company may not claim any general power which is not appropriate to, and consistent with, the construction, maintenance, and operation of its railroad.[56]

Construction of charter. In determining the extent of the powers conferred on a railroad company its charter must be construed as an entirety,[57] and so as to give effect to the intention of the legislature by which it was granted, as expressed by the language used or as fairly implied therefrom.[58] A grant of power is presumed to be made at the solicitation of the company and to be in form prepared by it,[59] and, accordingly, it will be construed in favor of the state and against the company.[60] Powers not conferred by express words or by necessary implication must be deemed withheld,[61] and if a particular power is omitted from those enumerated in the charter its exercise must be deemed to be prohibited unless there is an imperative implication to the contrary,[62] the enumeration of certain powers ordinarily implies the exclusion of all others.[63]

Contracts. In general, and in the absence of any express restriction or prohibition, a railroad company may, within the boundaries of legal action, make any contract for its corporate benefit for a proper consideration,[64] where the subject matter of the contract is not foreign to the purposes for which the company is created, but may fairly be regarded as incidental to, or consequential on those things which the legislature has authorized;[65] and the lawful result to be obtained is often, if not usually, the test of corporate power.[66] Power to construct and operate a railroad includes by implication the power to make all such contracts and agreements as the execution of its purposes and the convenience and interests of the company may require, as far as not forbidden by any restrictive provision.[67] The company has power to make a conditional agreement as well as a direct or absolute one.[68]

On the other hand, public policy precludes any agreement by a railroad which might prejudice either it or the welfare of the general public,[69] and any contract by which a railroad company attempts to absolve itself from its duties to the public or to render itself incapable of performing them is void and unenforceable, in the absence of the consent of the state,[70] except that, it has been held, where a merely permissive power to consolidate with other railroads has been conferred on it, a contract by which a company binds itself not to exercise such right is not invalid.[71] In the absence of express authorization a railroad company has no power to enter into a partnership.[72]

Acquisition of property. A railroad corporation may acquire and hold whatever properties are necessary for the operation of its business,[73] and, looking to future needs, it may acquire and hold more than it requires for present purposes.[74]

Application of money and property. A railroad company has no power to apply any of its money or property for any purpose except as directed and provided for by its charter or governing statute.[75] Thus, it is improper and wrong for a railroad company to embark its funds in other railroad undertakings, except when authorized by statute so to do.[76]

b. Charging for Transportation

The right to collect charges for transportation of freight and passengers is one of the essential powers of a railroad company.

It is an essential power of a railroad company to demand and receive tolls or charges for the transportation of freight and passengers[77]

Rates and rate making by carriers of goods are discussed in Carriers §§ 275–333; and passenger fares and tickets, in Carriers §§ 578–624 Rates and rate making by public utilities generally are considered in Public Utilities §§ 13–30, 41. Jurisdiction and powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission over rates are considered in Commerce § 143.

c. Engaging in Other Business

A railroad company may engage in any business within its express charter or statutory authorization or which is reasonably implied as incidental thereto.

In accordance with the principles governing the scope of the powers of corporations generally, discussed in Corporations §§ 941–959, a railroad company may engage in any business authorized by its charter or by statute,[78] and in any business incidental or auxiliary to the powers granted, the conduct of which becomes necessary and expedient in the care and management of its principal business.[79] Despite the absence of express statutory or charter provisions therefor, and in the absence of positive restrictions it has been held that a railroad company may, where it is necessary and convenient so to do, provide the services of a customs broker for its shippers,[80] operate telegraph and telephone lines and instruments for the purposes of its business,[81] or operate and maintain hotels, eating houses, and dining cars for the accommodation of its employees and passengers.[82] The fact that a railroad company is not authorized to engage in the business of buying and selling grain does not prevent it from holding a membership in a grain exchange for the purposes of learning when grain is to be transported to other markets, coming in contact with shippers, and soliciting the consignment of their grain over its road.[83]

On the other hand, a railroad company lacks authority to engage in any business which is neither within its express charter or statutory powers nor reasonably incidental thereto,[84] and may be restrained by appropriate action from so doing[85] Thus, it has been held that a railroad company lacks power to operate stages from its termini to distant towns,[86] or to carry on an express business,[87] or to engage in banking,[88] or to deal generally in commercial paper,[89] or to conduct a real estate business[90] A company chartered for the operation of an ordinary commercial railroad has no power to operate a street railroad or to extend its line as such.[91]

It has been variously held that a railroad company using electricity for motive power may,[92] or may not,[93] sell excess electric power to others or to the general public. While it has been held that where necessary and convenient in connection with its business, a railroad company may collect and deliver freight,[94] and that it is not beyond the implied powers of a railroad to engage a transfer line to carry on a pick-up and delivery service by truck for receiving or delivering freight going between shippers and the railroad,[95] there is also authority to the effect that a railroad may not transfer freight beyond its terminus to a station of another railroad.[96] Although a railroad may store or be a depository of goods which are to be or have been transported by it,[97] it may not carry on a general warehouse or storage business.[98]

Operation of ferry or steamer. Even though authorized to operate a ferry for the transportation of its passengers and freight,[99] a railroad may not engage in a general ferry business.[1] A railroad company may properly operate steamboats for the purpose of transporting its freight and passengers over waters constituting a part of its route or over those lying between the end of its railroad and the real terminus thereof;[2] but it may not operate a steamboat line on waters forming no part of its route or termini.[3]

Holding stock as engaging in business. The mere holding by a railroad company of the stock of a company engaged in another business is not engaging in such other business.[4]

Who may question right. The right of a railroad company to engage in a particular business cannot be attacked collaterally,[5] and, ordinarily, the question may be raised only in a direct action by the state or by a stockholder.[6]

§ 17. Duration and Termination of Corporate Existence

In the absence of a limiting provision of statute or charter, a railroad corporation has a perpetual existence in the sense that its charter will not expire by limitation of time, although it may be surrendered or forfeited under certain circumstances.

Under the general rule that corporations may have perpetual existence, discussed in Corporations § 78, a railroad company, in the absence of any limiting provision of its charter or the statute under which it is incorporated, has no specific duration and its existence as a corporation does not terminate merely by reason of the passage of time,[7] but, where charter or statute fixes a definite period of time during which its corporate life may continue, the company automatically ceases to exist as a corporation at the end of such period.[8] At any time a railroad company, like any other corporation, may have its corporate existence terminated by a voluntary surrender of its corporate franchises under principles discussed infra § 18, by consolidation with another company, infra § 239, or by an involuntary dissolution or forfeiture of its franchises at the instance of the state, infra § 18. Under some statutes, however, a railroad company continues to exist for a specified period after its charter has expired or been annulled for the purposes of suing and being sued, and closing up its business,[9] at the end of which period it entirely ceases to exist.[10]

Extension and renewal. To extend a railroad charter is to give one presently existing a greater or longer time within which to operate than that to which it was originally limited,[11] and the legislature ordinarily has power to extend such a charter;[12] and, where it has done so, the charter will be extended in accordance with the provisions of the particular statute enacted[13] Where a statute expressly provides that the charter of a railroad company "is hereby extended" and also confers certain powers on it, such statute should be construed as effecting an extension and not as limited to the grant of enumerated powers.[14] The corporate existence of one railroad company may be continued by an act of the legislature in a new company under a new name;[15] but a statute incorporating a railroad company and transferring to and vesting in it all the property and franchises of a company whose corporate existence had previously terminated does not revive or continue the latter company[16]

Retention of corporate identity despite operation by others. It has been held that a railroad corporation retains its corporate identity despite the fact that its stock is owned by a holding company and that its road is operated as part of another railroad system.[17]

§ 18. Amendment, Revocation, or Forfeiture of Charter or Franchise, and Dissolution

a. Amendment and revocation
b. Forfeiture of charter or franchise and dissolution

a. Amendment and Revocation

(1) In general
(2) Assent or acceptance

(1) In General

The contractual character of a railroad charter ordinarily precludes its material alteration or amendment by the legislature without the consent of the corporation, except where the right of alteration or amendment has been reserved.

Inasmuch as a railroad company is a private corporation, as discussed supra § 3, the state cannot violate the contractual relations created by its charter,[18] and does not have the broad power of control which it may exercise over strictly public corporations.[19] After a railroad company has been duly incorporated or its charter has been accepted, the state cannot, without the consent of such company, alter or amend its charter in such a way as materially to affect its rights;[20] but railroad charters are subject to any constitutional provisions, existing at the time of the company's incorporation, which authorize the alteration or revocation of such charters,[21] or empower the legislature to pass regulatory laws,[22] and subject also to existing general laws relating to railroad companies,[23] except as modified or superseded by special charters,[24] as well as to any power expressly reserved by the legislature to revoke, alter, or amend the charter[25]

Where a railroad company is incorporated or a charter accepted subject to the reserved power of amendment, the legislature may withdraw powers previously granted to the company[26] or confer new powers or duties on it and require their exercise;[27] and the company is bound by any reasonable alteration or amendment the legislature may see fit to make,[28] at least where the amendment does not go beyond regulation, supervision, and control of the company in the public interest.[29] A lease of its road does not affect a reserved right to amend the charter of the company.[30] An amendment may be made by a statute which does not in terms refer to the charter or modify it;[31] but a statute will ordinarily not be deemed to be enacted in exercise of the power of amendment or revocation unless the intention to amend or revoke the charter clearly appears.[32]

Before acceptance of charter. Until there has been an acceptance of the original charter of a railroad company, when so required, it is within the control of the legislature and may be amended or revoked,[33] and an amendment under such circumstances is merely a revival of the legislative right to form a corporation.[34]

Validity. In order that an amendment to a railroad company's charter or articles of incorporation may be valid, there must be a compliance with any statutory requirements as to filing or registration.[35] Defects in an amendment may be cured by a subsequent statute.[36]

(2) Assent or Acceptance

In the absence of a power of amendment reserved to the legislature, the assent of the railroad company to an amendment of its charter is essential in order to make it binding.

From the general rule that the charter of a railroad company cannot be amended without the consent of the company, discussed supra subdivision a (1) of this section, it follows that, where no power of amendment has been reserved to the legislature, or in the case of an amendment which does not come within the reserved power, an amendment must be assented to, or accepted by, the company in order to be binding on it,[37] but the company has the right to accept or assent to an amendment,[38] and on so doing becomes bound thereby.[39]

Assent is sufficiently manifested by asking the legislature to make the amendment,[40] or by expressly accepting an amendment theretofore enacted,[41] or by acting on, or acquiescing in, such amendment.[42]

Unanimous or majority assent of stockholders While a majority of the stockholders of a corporation may in some cases bind the others by accepting or assenting to an amendment, as discussed in Corporations § 81, unanimous consent of the stockholders, corporators, or members of a railroad company may be required, and dissenters be released, where an amendment is fundamental, radical, or vital in character,[43] as where it in fact constitutes a separate and distinct charter, creating a new company,[44] unless such stockholders, corporators, or members are estopped by acquiescence or otherwise, as considered in Corporations § 81 d (2). The want of an acceptance by a sufficient number of stockholders may be waived by those dissenting or not joining therein;[45] and the state may not object that proper assent was not given.[46] The failure of any stockholder to object to the exercise of a power conferred by an amendment, at a meeting held for that purpose, constitutes a sufficient concurrence in, and assent to, such amendment by all the stockholders.[47]

Where power to amend has been reserved, no acceptance of an amendment to a charter is necessary and it becomes operative without the assent of the company.[48] suffer dissolution for misuse of, or failure to use, its franchise and powers in essential matters; or it may, within limitations imposed by its public duties, effect a voluntary dissolution.

It may be ground for forfeiting the franchise of a railroad company and dissolving the company that it has willfully and repeatedly misused or failed to exercise its franchise and powers with respect to matters which are of the essence of the contract between the company and the state,[49] as where it makes a material departure from the points designated in the charter for the location of the road,[50] or where the management makes discriminations clearly showing an intention to exclude from the benefits of the road all except its principal stockholders for the purpose of preventing competition,[51] and the company may also be dissolved for any act or omission on its part made a cause for forfeiture by its charter or governing statute,[52] as for a breach of a material condition subsequent prescribed therein.[53] Unless otherwise provided by constitution or statute, however, an isolated case of nonuser or misuser is not in itself ground for a forfeiture of a company's charter,[54] nor is the fact that the company intends to neglect the performance of its full duties to the public[55] or that it has obtained a charter from another state.[56] A misuser or nonuser with respect only to a matter not materially concerning the public or the performance of the company's public duties is not cause for a forfeiture.[57] Misconduct or infidelity on the part of the officers or trustees of a railroad company is not ground for dissolving it,[58] and the remedy in such case is to enjoin the misconduct or remove the officers.[59]

In the absence of constitutional, statutory, or charter provisions to the contrary,[60] a railroad company is not ipso facto dissolved by an improper act or omission.[61] Failure to construct or complete the road as effecting an automatic dissolution is discussed infra subdivision b (3) of this section.

Voluntary dissolution A railroad company may be dissolved by a voluntary surrender of its franchises,[62] except in so far as its public duties may limit the right so to do, as considered infra subdivision b (4) of this section, and the legislature may release the company from such limitation.[63] The failure of a railroad company which has been divested of its property by judicial sales to do any business or maintain its corporate organization for many years has been held to show a voluntary surrender of its corporate franchise.[64] A voluntary dissolution is not a corporate act but the act of the members of the company,[65] and its officers in effecting such an arrangement act as trustees of the members, and not as corporate functionaries.[66]

(2) Lease or Sale of Property

The lease or sale of all its property by a railroad corporation does not of itself effect a dissolution of the corporation or relieve it from its debts and obligations; but such a lease or sale, in combination with other factors, may be ground for forfeiture of its charter.

The mere leasing by a railroad company of all or any part of its property,[67] or the voluntary[68] or judicial[69] sale thereof, does not of itself work such a dissolution of the company as to disable it from thereafter exercising its corporate powers; nor does it relieve the company from its debts and obligations.[70] On the other hand, a sale of all the corporate property may be deemed a dissolution of the company for the purpose of protecting and enforcing the rights of third persons,[71] and in case of a judicial sale of all the corporate property and franchises of the company the court may be justified in administering the assets of the company as if a legal dissolution had occurred.[72] Where a sale or lease is accompanied by acts made a cause of forfeiture by statute,[73] or by acts or omissions which amount to a willful misuser or nonuser of the corporate franchises of the company,[74] it may work a forfeiture or constitute grounds on which the state may have a forfeiture declared.

(3) Failure to Construct or Complete Road

A railroad may suffer dissolution or forfeiture of its charter for misuse or nonuse of its powers in respect of construction of the road Under some statutes, but not under others, failure to complete construction of the road within a specified time may result in an automatic forfeiture of its charter or in an automatic loss of certain powers thereunder.

In accordance with the general rules relating to the involuntary dissolution of a railroad company and the forfeiture of its charter and corporate franchise, discussed supra subdivision b (1) of this section, a railroad company may be dissolved by reason of a wrongful misuse or nonuse of its corporate powers relative to the construction of the road,[75] as where it delays for an unreasonable time to construct the line provided in its charter,[76] or constructs a railroad wholly unsuited to the needs of the public;[77] but mere delay in construction or completion is not, in the absence of statutory restriction as to time, ground for forfeiture of its charter rights unless the lapse is so long as to amount to an abandonment,[78] and delay in actual construction does not render the charter liable to forfeiture where the company is engaged in continuous endeavors to finance the proposed construction.[79] In the absence of a provision to the contrary, failure to construct or to maintain a railroad is not ground for automatic dissolution of the corporation, but may be taken advantage of only by a direct proceeding against the company in behalf of the state for the purpose of procuring a judgment of forfeiture by reason of the nonuser of the franchise,[80] and the state may have an election whether or not to proceed to forfeit the franchise.[81]

Construction within prescribed time. In the absence of a statutory or charter provision to that effect the mere fact that a railroad company fails to begin, carry on, or complete the construction of its road within a time or at a rate of progress specified in its charter or governing statute does not of itself work a dissolution of the company,[82] although it is usually ground for which a forfeiture may be declared in a direct proceeding by or on behalf of the state,[83] but under some statutes such a failure constitutes a forfeiture or dissolution, without the intervention of the courts or any action on the part of the state.[84] Where the condition is that the company expend a certain amount of its capital within a specified time, the fact that it has granted to another company the privilege of laying tracks on parts of its route will not enable it to retain its corporate existence without making the prescribed expenditures;[85] nor will a reservation to the lessor in such case of a right to run cars over part of the track laid by the lessee avail to give the lessor the benefit of expenditures by the lessee.[86] Such a provision for construction or completion cannot be defeated by transferring the right of way to another company.[87]

such portion of the road as has not been constructed within the time limited,[88] or for the automatic forfeiture of all unexercised charter powers;[89] and it has been held under the latter type of statute that the general rule that omission to perform a duty merely exposes a corporation to the hazard of forfeiture of its charter by court proceedings without ipso facto effecting its dissolution does not preclude an automatic deprivation of unused charter powers.[90] A provision requiring construction or completion within a specified time relates, however, only to the line of railroad authorized by the company's original charter or articles of incorporation,[91] and so failure to complete extensions subsequently authorized or undertaken is not ground for forfeiture[92] It has been held that a period during which a railroad company was in the hands of a receiver is not to be included in determining whether its road has been completed within the time prescribed therefor.[93]

(4) Suspension or Abandonment of Railroad Business

Unjustifiable failure to operate its road or business, or voluntary surrender thereof, may afford ground for dissolution of a railroad company or forfeiture of its charter.

The unjustifiable failure of a railroad company to operate its railroad or business, or its voluntary abandonment thereof, is ground for the dissolution of the company and the forfeiture or annulment of its corporate franchise,[94] and, under some statutes, an abandonment of a part of its line is ground for a forfeiture of the company's corporate franchise as to the entire line[95] In the absence of statute providing therefor, however, it is no cause for forfeiture that the company discontinues unprofitable trains,[96] and it has also been held that a forfeiture will not be declared for a failure or refusal to run trains to a certain place, where there is no injury to the public and a forfeiture would not redress the grievance of which complaint is made[97]

Length of suspension. In some jurisdictions, under particular statutes, a suspension of the maintenance and operation of the road for a specified time is ground for a forfeiture[98] It has been held that a suspension or abandonment extending beyond the period so prescribed admits of no explanation or excuse to prevent a forfeiture from occurring or being declared,[99] but a nonuser for any period less than that specified by the statute is no ground for a dissolution.[1]

Voluntary dissolution by abandonment. A railroad company cannot incur a forfeiture or dissolve itself at its own pleasure and in disregard of the rights of others merely by abandoning its road or business,[2] and such abandonment or the entire disuse of the railroad is not enough to absolve the company from the performance of its duties.[3]

Public policy

The state as part of its public policy imposes rigid limitation on time within which railroad company must complete special undertakings of its charter and makes failure to do so operate automatically as a forfeiture of all of unexercised charter powers, except such as may be necessary to maintain facilities placed in operation prior to the forfeiture —Chicago, B & Q. (5) Waiver or Nonenforcement of Forfeiture

The state may waive the right to forfeit the franchise of a railroad company.

Forfeiture of the franchise of a railroad company is a prerogative of the state,[4] which may be waived by it,[5] even after the occurrence of an act or omission which by constitution or statute is made a cause of forfeiture ipso facto,[6] and a cause of forfeiture is waived by acquiescing for an unreasonable time in the construction and operation of the railroad,[7] or by the enactment of a statute recognizing the company and authorizing the construction or operation of its road,[8] or extending the time for the completion of the road,[9] or expressly releasing the company from a cause of forfeiture or legalizing a violation.[10] A statute, however, relieving railroad companies from past defaults has no application to causes of forfeiture arising after the passage of the act.[11]

A waiver on condition may be revoked on a breach of the condition.[12]

(6) Proceedings

As a general rule the charter or franchise of a railroad company may be forfeited only in a direct proceeding for that purpose instituted by the state.

While under some constitutional, statutory, or charter provisions improper acts or omissions on the part of a railroad company may ipso facto render its charter and corporate franchise forfeited and the company dissolved, as discussed supra subdivisions b (1), (3) of this section, in the absence of any such provision a company may be deprived of its corporate franchise and an involuntary dissolution decreed against it only in a direct judicial proceeding, usually in the nature of quo warranto, instituted by, or in behalf of, the state for that purpose.[13] So, it has been held that except where forfeiture has resulted ipso facto from acts or omissions specified by statute,[14] the right of the company to corporate existence cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding,[15] and, where the state has not proceeded to have a forfeiture declared or enforced, it cannot be invoked by a private individual or corporation.[16] Accordingly, where a pleading in a collateral proceeding seeks to set up the fact of forfeiture, it must usually allege that the forfeiture has been judicially declared in a suit for that purpose.[17]

Parties. In a proceeding to forfeit the charter of a railroad company because of the sale of its road, the purchaser is not a necessary party.[18] The lessee of a railroad has such an interest in the forfeiture of the charter of the lessor company as to entitle it to intervene in proceedings therefor.[19]

Pleading. The information or complaint in a proceeding by the state to enforce a forfeiture of a charter of a railroad company must set forth facts showing a good cause of forfeiture,[20] but it need not be expressed in technical language.[21] The complaint ordinarily need not allege that the acts or omissions alleged were prohibited by statute[22] or that injury to the public has resulted therefrom.[23]

Presumptions and burden of proof. In the case of an act or omission which would ipso facto terminate the corporate existence of the company, the presumption will be indulged, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that no forfeiture has occurred,[24] and the burden of proving the contrary is on the one asserting it.[25] Where minority stockholders seek dissolution of a railroad corporation, there is a presumption that its officers and directors acted honestly and in good faith in continuing the operation of the road,[26] and a clear and convincing showing of bad faith is required to warrant the interference of the court.[27]

Determination and disposition. Where, in proceedings by, or on behalf of, the state, the evidence clearly shows the existence of a ground for forfeiting the company's charter, it is mandatory on the court to declare a forfeiture.[28]

(7) Operation and Effect

The dissolution of a railroad company deprives it of its corporate powers, but its property rights survive for the benefit of those who may have a right to, or just claims against, its assets.

The general rules relative to the operation and effect of forfeiture of corporate charters and the dissolution of other corporations, discussed in Corporations §§ 1727-1737, are applicable to railroad companies,[29] except as they may be modified or superseded by special statutory or charter provisions.[30] Thus all its general powers, as to be a corporation, to sue and be sued, to have a corporate seal, to acquire and hold property, and the like,[31] and such additional powers as may have been conferred on it,[32] cease and can no longer be exercised. Similarly, the officers of the company are divested by the forfeiture or dissolution of all their powers,[33] except that under some statutes they may continue to exercise powers necessary to wind up the company.[34]

On the other hand, the property rights of the company ordinarily survive for the benefit of those who may have a right to, or just claims against, its assets,[35] subject to loss by abandonment or forfeiture,[36] and so consents and franchises granted it by a municipality continue in existence and pass to the directors as trustees for the creditors and stockholders,[37] provided they are not subject to forfeiture for nonuser, as considered in Franchises § 27. It has been held that a railroad, although there has been a forfeiture or repeal of the company's charter, remains a public highway subject to the management and control of the state.[38]

Recovery of money deposited with state. It has been said that, on forfeiture of its charter for failure to construct its road, a railroad company has no right to recover moneys deposited with the state under a statute requiring such deposit at the time of organization, and providing for repayment of specified sums as construction proceeds.[39]

B. FOREIGN COMPANIES

§ 19. In General

Subject to exceptions provided for by constitutions or statutes, general rules relating to foreign corporations, as far as applicable, govern foreign railroad corporations.

Except as they may be modified or superseded by special constitutional or statutory provisions, the general rules relating to foreign corporations govern foreign railroad companies, as far as applicable thereto.[40] The privilege of a foreign corporation to operate a railroad within a state has been held to rest in comity,[41] although such a corporation may be authorized to build and operate a railroad within a state by act of the legislature.[42]

Under some constitutional provisions a railroad company chartered under the laws of a foreign state cannot operate any railroad within the state.[43] The view has been taken, however, that only the state may take advantage of such a constitutional provision.[44] A statutory provision prohibiting a corporation not chartered under the laws of the state to construct, acquire or operate a railroad within the state does not apply to a natural person.[45]

Under a statute requiring the payment of a tax, equal to the organization tax imposed on domestic railroad companies, by all foreign corporations doing business within the state except those which have theretofore built lines of railroad into or through the state, a foreign company thereafter extending an existing line within the state becomes liable for the payment of the organization tax on all that part of its capital employed in the state except such portion as was expended in the construction of the existing line.[46]

§ 20. Domestication or Domestic Incorporation

A state may require a foreign railroad company to become a corporation of the state as a condition precedent to the right of such company to own or operate a railroad within the state.
